No Kay at USA

Cable network chief Koplovitz seen as casualty of company takeover by Diller

By John M. Higgins

Kay Koplovitz’s resignation last week as chairman of USA Networks leaves no doubt that Barry Diller wants a free hand in retooling USA Network and its companion Sci-Fi Channel.

“She saw a point coming down the pike where she didn’t get the control she wanted,” says one executive.

“Barry bought it to run it,” says a Diller associate.

Koplovitz positioned her resignation as a chance to take advantage of an “extraordinary number of opportunities” that she has been offered in recent months. But company executives say it was due to Diller, chairman of parent USA Networks Inc., who plans to exert more control over the cable network operation than she is willing to deal with.

Her departure marks the fall of another of the few women who have risen to top posts in major media companies (see box below). Still on top: Disney Co. cable president Gerry Laybourne; Disney Channel President Anne Sweeney; Discovery Communications President Judith McHale; MTV President Judy McGrath and BET President Debra Lee.

Koplovitz has been talking with Diller for months about leaving, says another executive, but she had not settled on a date, severance terms or other possibilities within USA Networks’ cable, broadcasting, home shopping or production portfolio.

Through what was then called HSN Inc., Diller cut a deal to buy the controlling stake in USA Networks and Universal Television from Seagram Corp. last October, closing on the deal in February. In addition to fixing Universal’s slackened TV production arm, Diller’s task is to marshal the assets to support a new CitiVision broadcast network he is creating with HSN’s string of TV stations.

Diller has outlined broad strategies for USA Network and companion Sci-Fi Channel, but he hasn’t revealed many details. One tactic is to shift some USA Network programming over to the USA Broadcasting start-up network operation, putting some of the cable network’s shows on the TV stations for a second run. The later window is aimed at mollifying MSOs unhappy about seeing the programs’ cable exclusivity diluted.

“USA is doing very well, as we know,” Diller says. “USA has to become a more defined programming service over time. There has to be enough definition so that when you say USA Network, you know what to expect.”

He doesn’t believe the network’s mix of original series, movies, wrestling and boxing accomplishes that, and he believes Sci-Fi suffers

The dwindling number of women in high-ranking broadcasting and cable jobs just dwindled again. With last week’s resignation of Kay Koplovitz, chairman of USA Networks, the already underrepresented are becoming even less visible. As former United Paramount Network Chairman Lucie Salhany was quoted as saying last October, “This is now a business in consolidation and I think it’s going to be harder for women, because in so many cases they’re just not part of the inner circle.”

Here are some high-profile women who have left or lost power in the past 10 months:

■ ABC Entertainment President Jamie Tarses told the New York Times last June that she felt “emasculated” and would leave after Stuart Bloomberg was brought in as chairman of her division. However, Tarses, the first woman to be an entertainment chief at one of the Big Three networks, remains at the network—albeit reporting to Bloomberg instead of to ABC Inc. President Robert A. Iger.

■ Former UPN Chairman Salhany left that post last September after an embattled three years. Previously, as chairman of Fox Broadcasting, Salhany was the first woman to head a U.S. television network.

She now is consulting and investing in TV stations in markets where UPN needs stronger distribution.

■ Margaret Loesch was named vice chairman of Fox Kids Worldwide last July after serving as chairman of Fox Kids Networks Worldwide. It was speculated that the move was made to allow recently named FKW Chairman Haim Saban to take over day-to-day programming duties. Loesch quit last November and in February surfaced as president of the newly created Jim Henson TV Group, which plans to launch a cable channel.

Koplovitz, called a “visionary pioneer” in her own press release, helped create USA Network at Paramount in 1977. Originating as an outgrowth of Madison Square Garden, USA Network evolved into a broader entertainment network filled with old broadcast TV series and theatrical movies, shifting more heavily into original productions in the past several years.

It was run for years as a joint venture of studios Paramount and Universal, which not only found it a profitable cable outlet for their theatrical movies but also used it as a dumping ground for TV series that did not do well in broadcast syndication. The two studios changed hands two years ago, triggering a wrestling match in which new Universal owner Seagram bought the half owned by Paramount owner Viacom Inc.

NBC’s Rogers trying to buy Court TV

NBC Cable President Tom Rogers is trying to assemble an investment group to buy beleaguered Court TV from the fractious partnership that includes his employer. Sources say that Rogers has for weeks sought financial backing to bid on the TV legal network. Court TV was put up for sale last fall and then yanked back after the many strings attached to a deal repelled buyers. But now Rogers is looking to team with an institutional investor to take the low-rated network and operate it. The sources say that Rogers faces enormous complications in getting a deal done. First, the partners—Time Warner Inc., Liberty Media Corp. and NBC—will not allow the network to fall into the hands of a competitor, such as News Corp. or ABC. That means Rogers’ backers would have difficulty selling out in five to seven years. Also, the Court TV board has suffered from tremendous friction among its members, including Rogers, so it may not be eager for him to personally benefit from a deal. Rogers also faces difficulty in negotiating with NBC. “This is very complicated given the nature of the relationships,” says one executive involved in Court TV.

A quick resolution is not expected. When ousted Court TV CEO Steve Brill offered to buy the network last year, he valued it at more than $400 million. It isn’t clear how the restrictions might depress the value. Rogers could not be reached for comment.

Thumbs up for Karmazin, Moonves promotions

Wall Street, affiliates agree moves will strengthen CBS

By John M. Higgins and Steve McClellan

Mel Karmazin’s promotion last week, from head of the CBS Station Group to president and chief operating officer of CBS Corp. (B&C, April 8), confirms what most have taken for granted all along—that Karmazin will succeed CBS Chairman Michael Jordan when he retires in three years at age 65.

CBS Television President Leslie Moonves also got a promotion last week. He added the title of chief executive officer, with responsibility for the entire network, including CBS News and CBS Sports. Those entities previously had reported directly to Jordan. Moonves, who had reported to Jordan, now reports to Karmazin.

Wall Street and the network’s affiliates applauded the reshuffling. CBS stock was up half a point, to almost $56 a share. “Karmazin is the reason the network’s stock price has more than doubled over the past year,” says one Wall Streeter. “Obviously he didn’t do it single-handedly, but that’s the perception on the Street.”

Alan Bell, president of the Freedom Communications broadcasting division, says he was “pleased and excited” by the move. “CBS has enormous upside potential, and this is a very positive sign” that the company is solidifying its management team to reach that potential.

At the same time, Bell and others say that the announcement was no surprise and merely formalized what had already been in effect. “Mel Karmazin has seminal operating insight” possessed by few, Bell says. “Broadcasting is a revenue-generating business. Mel knows how to get the sales, and Les Moonves will deliver the ratings” that Karmazin needs to get the sales.

“Jordan is no operator and makes no pretense of being one, sources say. But he gets a lot of credit for implementing the strategy that transformed former CBS owner Westinghouse from a struggling industrial has been to a high-growth media concern.

Westinghouse bought Karmazin-led Infinity Broadcasting in June 1996. Karmazin has run all of CBS’s radio properties since then. Last May he took control of the company’s owned television stations as well. Now Karmazin will oversee all of CBS’s operating divisions, including cable, television and radio.

Two years ago, Moonves joined CBS as president of the entertainment division. Late last year he was promoted to president, CBS Television. He became responsible for the entertainment division and the Eyemark syndication unit, as well as certain New York-based network functions, including ad sales, promotion and research.

Now he’ll oversee the entire entertainment and network operation.

Moonves will continue to be based in Los Angeles, making more frequent trips to New York. Last week, he said he would hire a senior executive to help run the day-to-day activities of the entertainment division.

“From speculation that Karmazin and Moonves have tried to outmaneuver each other in their quest for power at CBS. But, says Bell, “I’ve never seen it and I don’t believe it. They are two colorful characters, and they need each other. They play off each other’s strengths.”
Allen money gives Marcus room to grow

Paul Allen's nearly $3 billion investment in Marcus Cable (B&C, April 8) didn't have the electrifying impact of last year's $1 billion Microsoft/Comcast deal, but it paves the way for Marcus to move into the top tier of cable MSOs.

"We're going to be growing Marcus and using Marcus as the vehicle for other acquisitions," says William Savoy, Allen's top investment strategist and president of Vulcan Ventures.

In buying out Marcus's limited partners for $2.775 billion, Allen—one of the world's richest men—made his largest personal investment to date. Money clearly will no longer be a limiting factor for the nation's 10th-largest MSO. It's now in a position to move quickly on targets of opportunity—particularly cable systems that can enhance existing clusters.

"Deal flow has never been an issue for me," says Jeffrey Marcus, who founded Marcus Cable in 1990 and remains as general partner, chairman, CEO and president. "We want to see the market grow."

If that's a longer-term objective, part of the short-term plan is to refinance more than $1 billion of Marcus's roughly $1.6 billion in debt, says a source familiar with the transaction. A hefty chunk of that debt is in junk bonds, some with interest rates as high as 14.25%. The refinancing won't be cheap. By conservative estimates, Marcus faces at least $80 million in early repayment penalties. Others familiar with the company's financial structure say that the penalties could be much higher.

With the new access to capital, "We'll look at restructuring the capital structure," acknowledges Marcus, adding, "I would not rule out an IPO to create a currency."

Access to capital also will enable Marcus to speed rebuilds and hasten deployment of such digital services as high-speed Internet connections. That's a high priority for Allen.

"Over 20 years ago, even before I founded Microsoft with Bill Gates, I began thinking about a connected future," Allen said at the press conference announcing the deal. "I called that future the wired world.... By investing...

Marcus buy doesn't excite Wall Street

A sexy (by Wall Street standards) techie titan makes a surprise multimillion-dollar jump into cable. But MSO stocks barely react, pretty much sliding sideways. What's wrong with this picture?

The problem is that the terms of Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen's $2.8 billion Marcus Cable Corp. deal aren't all that favorable to investors expecting cable stocks to continue spiraling upward. Despite multiple bidders and a tycoon who is willing to pay up for assets that might become an interesting playground, Allen's deal doesn't seem to be setting any new standards for cable system values.

Marcus Cable Corp. Chairman Jeff Marcus says that the deal values the company at 1 times running-rate cash flow, putting it right in the middle of the range that systems have been trading at for the past two years. (Excited investors have sent cable stocks soaring from about seven or eight times cash flow to 10 to 12.5 times cash flow.)

Traditionally, cable stocks have traded at a 20%-40% discount to private market values. When that gap has become too narrow, it has been a warning signal that MSO issues were too high and ready for a fall. The question here is whether public investors are too enthusiastic or whether private investors are not enthusiastic enough.

"The stocks have done nothing on all of this," says one Wall Street executive nervous about cable. "To a technician, that's the perfect sign of a market top, bullish news disregarded."

Others disagree. "It's clearly positive that somebody who's both wealthy and smart and comes from a computer background has come in," counters Merrill Lynch & Co. analyst Jessica Reif Cohen.

Tele-Communications Inc., Cox Communications Inc., Comcast Corp. and Cablevision Systems Corp. all traded up or down just 1%-2% for the week.

One question for financial players who slave over such valuation issues is whether the 1 timess multiple that Marcus advertises is legit. There are several ways to derive a valuation multiple. While sellers tend to inflate the multiple so they can brag about the great price they got, some industry executives say that Marcus is downplaying the valuation because his new partner, Allen, does not want to seem as if he's paying an extravagant price. "If you've seen the book it's more like 14 times cash flow," says one executive with an MSO that bid on the company.

But an investment banker familiar with the deal outlines several tweaks to the deal that ring the price to 11 times. For example, Allen's team considers the price for the cable operations to be $2.6 billion, because the deal includes about $200 million worth of systems that are being sold.

HBO sets new digital networks

Five channels will be added to existing multiplex channels to create a package of 10

By John M. Higgins

Home Box Office—expected to be a cornerstone for operators trying to sell new digital cable products—unveiled its plans to fill newfound channel capacity by launching five new channels to create a package of 10 paymovie networks.

The new packages—labeled "mega-brand multiplex"—include the core HBO and Cinemax channels, five new networks programmed by theme, plus three existing multiplex channels that are being rechristened and slightly reworked. The new networks will include a comedy channel, a family movie outlet and an "edgy," young-skewing channel. The new Cinemax services will focus on action and thriller movies.

Operators consider pay-movie channels critical to the success of digital cable. Research shows that heavy video users who are likely to pay extra for digital are movie hounds. Added screens of pay networks are one of the biggest draws.

Encore was the first to multiplex in anticipation of digital cable, launching 10 themed channels of older movies in 1998. Showtime has eight first-run movie channels—including the recently launched action channel, Showtime Extreme.

HBO The Works will include HBO; HBO Plus (formerly HBO2); HBO Signature (formerly HBO3), focusing on higher-quality theatrical and original movies; HBO Family; HBO Comedy, and young-skewing HBO Zone. Multi- max will include Cinemax, MoreMax (formerly Cinemax2), ActionMax and ThrillerMax.

HBO is not planning to charge operators extra license fees for the new networks. Operators will make money by increasing subscriber satisfaction and by reducing HBO's 60% annual customer churn rate.

Multiplexes will share their parent channels' programming, with scheduling shuffled to increase the chance that at any given moment a viewer will find something he wants to watch when he drops down on the couch.

HBO executives say that they want to offer as many choices as possible. The high capacity of DBS allows subscribers to get nine versions of HBO, including East, West and Mountain regional feeds, plus two multiplexes.

HBO has multiplexed its networks since 1991, offering one or two extra channels of essentially the same programming with the schedule scrambled.

However, multiplexing hasn't been the magic bullet for analog cable. Network executives acknowledge that it helps to attract new subscribers but does little to boost retention. That's a problem because high churn forces the company to spend millions on marketing to replace lost customers.

Pay churn in the small universe of DBS is close to half that of cable; since subscribers are forced to fork over some $300 to sign up, they don't readily disconnect. It is not known if the DBS experience will translate to cable.

Heavy multiplexing may increase variety at a particular hour, but it also could exacerbate another problem: repetition. The biggest complaint of disconnecting subscribers is that the same movies and programs are shown over and over.

Dave Baldwin, HBO senior vice president of program planning, says repetition is an issue when "nothing" is on but a repeat. "The negative perception of repetition actually decreases" with extra channels, Baldwin says. "Repetition is only a problem if there's lack of choice."

MediaOne hooks up phone service in L.A.

By Price Colman

MediaOne began offering residential telephone service in parts of metropolitan Los Angeles last week, marking the company's second major phone service launch in less than three months.

The Los Angeles launch follows the late-January offering in Atlanta of digital residential telephone service via a hybrid fiber/coax network.

Initially, MediaOne is offering phone service to 35,000 homes in the Los Angeles suburb of Culver City. But the company plans to progressively roll out phone service to its entire 254,000-home market there throughout the year.

Although other cable companies, including Time Warner and Cablevision Systems, offer residential phone service via HFC networks, they focus on business customers. TCI, which slowed its cable-telephony initiative in 1996, is concentrating on Internet Protocol telephony using the HFC backbone. TCI has substantial plant upgrades still ahead and won't do much with telephony until 1999.

MediaOne, on the other hand, has been the most aggressive cable operator in pursuing residential markets in these early days of cable telephony.

Along with Los Angeles and Atlanta, MediaOne has major clusters in suburban Boston (the largest); the Southeast, including south Florida and Richmond, Va.; suburban Detroit, and suburban Chicago. Telephony launches in Detroit and Boston are likely in the works.

Service packages that MediaOne is offering in the Los Angeles area range from $39.75 a month to roughly $70 a month. Basic service includes one line with caller ID, call waiting, call forwarding, and speed dialing. All packages include 500 minutes of free local toll calls. Installation is free for all packages, and customers can keep their current phone numbers. Customers can add voice mail at $6.95 a month; for $11.95 a month they can subscribe to a MediaOne-supplied long-distance service with rates of 10 cents per minute.
The Big Dogs.
No appetite for competition.

The Big Dogs, MCI and AT&T, have no appetite for competition.

They claim they can't compete in local telephone markets. It's just too difficult. It requires too much effort.

But recently the Federal Communications Commission held hearings in which smaller local competitors described their success in competing against the Bell companies.

The little dogs are competing just fine.

- Scores of smaller companies across the country are successfully offering consumers residential local service via resold Bell company service.
- Smaller companies such as CITC Communications and ITC Deltacom are successfully offering business customers local service via resold Bell company service.
- Companies such as Intermedia, Metrolit USA and IGC Communications are offering local service over their own facilities, generating hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue and triple-digit annual percentage growth.

These smaller companies don't have the tens of thousands of employees that the big long distance giants do. They don't have billions of investment dollars. But they are competing.

So what's all the howling about?

Local phone companies have devoted more than $4 billion and assigned over 8,000 employees to make sure competition works. They've built customized network elements, offered on-site network training, and customer service 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, all to connect MCI and AT&T and other CLECs to local markets.

The big dogs lie around all day. They still have no appetite for competition.

MCI and AT&T have given up on residential local service. They claim they can't gain access to local markets, but smaller companies have proven them wrong.

MCI and AT&T are stalling competition. They only want competition on their own terms, on their own timetable. That's what their executives conceded during recent merger discussions. You know those big dogs. They lie around all day.

We'll connect all Americans if we're allowed to compete.

FCC worries about HDTV sets, cable plans

By Chris McConnell

Broadcasters in Las Vegas last week for the NAB convention heard complaints from regulators about equipment compatibility and cable's plans for carrying high-definition pictures.

"No consumer wants to buy five sets-top boxes, six remotes and a $6,000 television set that doesn’t work with cable," FCC Chairman William Kennard said.

Commissioner Susan Ness also was concerned that consumers will be confused as to what constitutes a cable-ready digital TV set: "Will the true high-definition set that [consumers] just bought display the true high-definition signal that the broadcaster has transmitted if the set is hooked up to cable? The answer had better be yes."

Ness added that she does not want to see a "bottleneck provider" such as cable deliver something less than the full high-definition signal that a broadcaster transmits. Kennard also cited the potential bottleneck problem and asserted that "no single competitor should have the power to unilaterally dictate the choices that you or I or any consumer makes."

FCC officials will be addressing cable's carriage of digital signals in about two months when they launch a rulemaking on must-carry rules in the digital TV age.

Ness voiced hopes that broadcasters and cable companies initially will strike agreements among themselves about cable's carriage of the digital signals: "I believe the broadcast and cable industries are doing just that."

It was a strategy favored by National Cable Television Association VP Daniel Brenner, who restated his industry's opposition to a digital must-carry requirement at last week's NAB convention. "Let's give some of the voluntary efforts a chance to give us some carriage information." Later, Brenner added that broadcasters can address questions of cable carriage through their retransmission consent negotiations with cable operators. "The broadcaster has the ability to withhold its signal," Brenner said.

Others wanted more assurance that the HDTV pictures will show up on the sets of cable subscribers. Washington lawyer Richard Wiley said that the broadcasters need to know whether cable systems will deliver high-definition signals. "We need these industries working together," Wiley said.

In addition to raising the question of cable carriage, Ness also warned whether the differing picture formats will confuse consumers: "Even the most knowledgeable people in industry can't agree on whether 1080 interlace or 720 progressive presents the best high-definition picture for the cost, or whether 480 P represents the most cost-effective option."

Americast says it's blocked from FX

Files complaint at FCC against Fox and Liberty Media

By Paige Albinik

Americast last week told the FCC that Fox and Liberty Media will not give it access to the joint venture's FX cable network.

Americast—a video distribution partnership of Ameritech New Media, Bell South, GTE and Southern New England Telephone (SNET) that operates in 48 communities—said that "it has been unlawfully denied the ability to offer the increasingly popular channel to its cable TV customers."

"We have been asking for FX for months, and we have been repeatedly denied," says Geoff Potter, a spokesman for Ameritech New Media.

Americast says that FX is violating the FCC's program-access rules because FX is owned by a 50-50 joint venture of TCI subsidiary Liberty Media and Fox. The program-access rules forbid any cable company that owns both programming interests and operators, such as TCI, from making any exclusive deals.

FX says it now is vertically integrated and has exclusive agreements with cable operators, but the network has argued in other cases pending before the FCC that it made those deals before TCI took a stake in FX. FX had no comment on Americast's complaint.

Direct broadcast satellite company EchoStar last year filed a program-access complaint against FX: FCC sources say that they will resolve the complaint soon.

TCI last year relinquished any claim of exclusivity with FX after EchoStar said that exclusive agreements with the Englewood, Colo.-based MSO were keeping EchoStar from being able to pick up FX and threatened to file a program-access complaint with the FCC.

"As a result of TCI's relinquishment of its right to such exclusivity with respect to FX, any program-access complaint which EchoStar may nevertheless wish to pursue on this matter against TCI would be entirely inappropriate," wrote then-TCI programming chief Jedd Palmer to EchoStar.

TCI thus having recused itself from the situation, FX Senior Vice President Patrick Wilson told EchoStar that "we would be pleased to discuss carriage of the FX service in any TCI operating area and in any non-cabled geographic area."

EchoStar was not satisfied with FX's response: "Your letter effectively denies EchoStar's request for carriage of the FX service, except in limited areas." EchoStar did not take FX up on the offer and filed a program-access complaint at the FCC soon thereafter.

Still, Ameritech New Media says FX never made it any such carriage offer and calls FX's proposal to EchoStar "not only illegal, it's anticonsument and anticompetitive," in the words of Deb Lenart, president of Ameritech New Media.

The FCC is undergoing a review of the program-access rules.

in Marcus, I will finally have some wires for my wired world.”

Allen’s Vulcan Ventures has invested in a number of companies that play to his vision of a wired world in which high-speed broadband networks link computers used as communications instruments. But Vulcan is so active and eclectic—other holdings include the NBA Portland Trailblazers, NFL Seattle Seahawks, and until recently, Ticketmaster—it’s tough to assess which of its investments Allen sees leveraging in the cable world where he’s now a significant player.

Skeptics might argue that from a pure investment perspective, Allen’s timing for getting into cable was less than stellar. Almost across the board, public and private values for cable systems are near or at historic highs. What Allen paid for a majority partnership in Marcus translates into some $2,500 per subscriber, or about 11 times running-rate cash flow at closing.

But Savoy dismisses that notion: “While on a relative basis cable stocks may be higher than they were, they’re certainly not overvalued from my standpoint. We wouldn’t make the investment if we thought that [cash-flow] multiples weren’t going to expand.”

Savoy also bristles at the idea that Allen invests out of whimsy or for fun. “To suggest that investments are made for anything other than return is just not accurate,” he says.

For Marcus Cable’s limited partners, the timing of Allen’s investment couldn’t have been better. Private equity investors typically seek a minimum 30% annualized return over five to seven years. Sources familiar with the Allen/Marcus deal say that the limited partners will do substantially better than that. Those limited partners include Goldman Sachs, with a 35.68% interest; Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst (18.63%); Freeman Spogli & Co. (15.99%); Greenwich Street Capital Partners (7.67%); and Marcus Cable Co. (6.24%).

It’s unclear what percentage Marcus, who had held about a 15% interest, will retain. He’s reportedly getting about $300 million, but he declined to comment.

According to sources familiar with the deal, Allen barely beat out two other bidders. MSOs reportedly interested included Comcast, Charter Communications and a TCI-led consortium.

High-priced Malrite

Raycom Media Inc. may have paid Malrite Communications Group as much as $1 billion for six TV stations plus one local marketing agreement and one time-brokerage agreement, according to rumors the company presented at the National Association of Broadcasters convention last week. “If it’s not $1 billion, it’s pushing it,” according to Fred Kalil of Kalil & Co. “To acquire a company of this caliber the price could easily be that high.” The value of the deal has not been released because of a gag order. Sources say, although it was rumored to be as much as 19 times cash flow. Raycom President John Hayes, on a tour of his new stations, said that the 19-times multiple is inflated, but refused to comment further. Malrite Chairman Milton Maltz did not return phone calls.

Don’t be surprised to see billionaire Paul Allen sporting Blues Brothers shades and hat the next time he plays an impromptu session with Threads, his garage band. The night before announcing his $2.775 billion investment in Marcus Cable, Allen dined with the Marcuses at their suburban Dallas home. Before dinner, he spent some time surfing the “Net on a high-speed cable modem. After dinner, Allen—a big Jimi Hendrix buff and a passionate amateur guitarist—headed upstairs with 18-year-old David Marcus for a jam session. Before Allen departed, David Marcus presented him with the Blues Brothers memorabilia.

Format flap

Although the major networks have selected their digital television formats, there’s still a lot of politicking about those choices. A week before the NAB convention, Microsoft held a demonstration in Washington of four digital TV formats—480 P, 480 I, 720 P and 1080 1. Taped material for the demonstration was supplied by Panasonic, which recently did a deal to supply ABC with 720 P equipment. Microsoft was planning to bring the demonstration to NAB last week. At the last minute, Panasonic took back its taped footage and Microsoft had to cancel the demonstration. Sources say Panasonic received “unbelievable pressure” from Japanese broadcaster NHK to withdraw from the demonstration.

Panasonic to Sony: Keep it on the floor

Panasonic executives were complaining to the NAB last week that the massive off-site exhibit Sony had at Bally’s hotel in Las Vegas, combined with Sony’s large but relatively sparse convention floor booth, was drawing attendees off the floor for long periods. “Holding a major exhibit off the floor is a major disservice to the industry,” said Panasonic Broadcast President Steve Bonica, who added that he was most worried about the impact Sony’s strategy would have on small manufacturers. Bonica said he had voiced his concern to NAB President Eddie Fritts and his staff, who had “been very responsive and sincere” in addressing the issue. Sony Broadcast President Charlie Steinberg dismissed Pan-asonic’s complaints, saying that customers appreciated the openness and applications-oriented exhibit on the floor but found it “much easier to grasp the message by touring Bally’s.” He also noted that the Bally exhibit wasn’t open in the morning, when the floor show was.

DBS companies say cable wants it both ways

Primestar plan would hurt satellite competition to cable, say

By Paige Albiniak

Cable companies should not be allowed to own direct broadcast satellite providers, Primestar’s competitors told the FCC last week.

"Approval of [the Primestar] transaction would effectively create a market model where DBS would be consigned to be a complement, not a substitute, for cable," EchoStar wrote in its comments.

"DBS ownership by cable would make it increasingly difficult for competing multichannel video programming distributors (MVPDs) to enter the market at the level needed to keep video programming rates in check and promote better and innovative services," wrote the National Rural Telecommunications Cooperative, which distributes DBS provider DirecTV in rural areas.

Primestar—owned by TCI spin-off TCI Satellite Entertainment: top MSOs Time Warner/Newhouse, MediaOne, Cox and Comcast, and GE American—is trying to get official Washington to approve a transaction that would allow it to run a high-power DBS service using satellite slots at 110 and 119 degrees west longitude. The FCC and the Department of Justice are debating whether to allow Primestar to control the two slots. One of the slots, controlled by News Corp., covers the entire continental United States.

Primestar last week delayed the launch of a full-capacity service from the Tempo 2 satellite at 119 while federal regulators investigate the transfer of the two high-power slots to the cable-owned DBS company. The company already is testing a service there but is petitioning the commission to extend the May 1 deadline to put the slot at 119 to commercial use (see story, page 39).

An FCC official says that he expects the commission to decide whether to allow Primestar to take ownership of one or both of the slots by May or June.

The National Cable Television Association proposed maintaining a case-by-case analysis of cable/DBS crossownership because there are only three satellite slots that cover the entire U.S. and five that offer partial U.S. coverage.

NCTA cited FCC Commissioner Harold Furchgott-Roth, who joined Commissioner Michael Powell in opposing the proposed cable/DBS crossownership rulemaking.

"There is no need for a general rule that has such limited and distant applicability. We will not be presented with DBS crossownership issues thousands, hundreds, or even tens of times. By virtue of the limited number of DBS orbital slots, such rules could be applied only a handful of times," Furchgott-Roth said.

The United Church of Christ (UCC) and the Consumers Union (CU), represented by the nonprofit law firm Media Access Project (MAP), oppose the Primestar rollup of its six partnerships into one publicly held company as well as Primestar’s proposed acquisition of the News Corp./MCI slot. But UCC and CU “see little reason to adopt a blanket rule prohibiting such crossownership,” MAP wrote in its comments.

In fact, MAP’s logic largely agrees with NCTA’s: “Given the small number of orbital slots, there is a possibility, however slight, that development of meaningful MVPD competition may justify cable/DBS crossownership at some point in the future.”

Ad Council counts $703.3 million in broadcast PSAs

The Ad Council reports radio and television broadcasters in 1997 donated an estimated $703.3 million in time and space to its public service announcements. That’s an increase of 48% from 1996.

Broadcast television increased its PSAs 42% in 1997, to $129.6 million from $91.6 million in 1996, according to the Ad Council. Radio contributed more than $573.7 million in Ad Council PSAs in 1997, a 6% increase from $542.3 million in 1996.

Brownback plans to be back

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) last week said that he is running for election to his first full six-year term. Brownback was elected to the Senate in 1994 to fill the seat of Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.), who retired to run for President. Last year, along with Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.), he introduced legislation that would grant broadcasters an antitrust exemption to create a code of conduct for television programming. Brownback previously served for six years as Kansas state agriculture secretary. He has no Republican challenger yet.

Rich Taylor was named vice president of public affairs for the Motion Picture Association of America. Association head Jack Valenti announced last week, "I am so pleased to make this announcement," Valenti said. "Rich Taylor has earned the respect of his peers, the media and the general public through his hard work, keen instincts and knowledge of industry concerns large and small." Taylor replaces Barbara Dixon, who is leaving to join Sony Pictures Entertainment as senior vice president of publicity May 1.

Radio pirates walk FCC plank

The FCC last week took to task five so-called radio pirates: Joseph Frank Ptak of San Marcos, Tex.; Lewis Arnold of Chlewollah, Wash.; Keith Perry of Leander, Tex.; Mark Rabenold of Oroville, Wash., and Jerry Szoka of Cleveland. The five operators face fines of $11,000 each for failing to cease radio transmissions after the commission warned them to stop. The five individuals now must prove to the FCC that it should not issue a "cease and desist" order and that it should not levy fines.

What's good for General Motors is good for TV

Philip Guarascio, marketing and advertising vice president for General Motors' North American operations, has a $2.1 billion advertising budget. Over time, he says, that budget may shrink as the company finds more efficient marketing and advertising methods. But in the short term, television will get a bigger share of the GM ad pie—Guarascio confirms he's shifting millions from print to TV in 1998. In the following interview with Steve McClellan, Broadcasting & Cable's New York bureau chief, Guarascio also chides the ad agency community for falling down on the job when it comes to keeping clients abreast of key content issues, and he criticizes what he considers a lack of creativity in exploring media buy options. He also talks about the impact of escalating sports rights on TV, GM's search for programming ventures and more.

How's the U.S. car industry holding up overall this year?
In the 12 years I've been at GM, this is probably the most intensely competitive situation the business has been in. A strong market with a lot of capacity and a fairly weak yen is driving it, making the price of the Japanese imports very low.

What does that portend for the company's ad spending, if anything?
I would say that we are going to go through a year that is more promotionally intense as a result of that, and we may even see it for next year too. I think that's good news for the television business, because when we move into intense promotional periods the challenge we have is to manage brands, and we have a philosophy that there is a minimum level of advertising you need to support a brand.

So you'll be spending more on advertising?
I think it's more a question of mix. One of the ways you compete in a highly intense environment is to manage your marketing costs. Forget about advertising per se: We look at the pot a little more broadly than that. We look at market-support launches, which include promotions, vending, sales, merchandising, advertising and event marketing.

In 1997 the North American division of GM spent nearly $2.1 billion in advertising. Will the company's ad spending increase this year?
No. I think in the 1995-97 time period we fundamentally got our budget to...
Don't mind

He'll just be staring at ESPN this fall for about 4
Football isn't just a pastime. It's a passion.
And now, with a full season of NFL programming and NFL 2Night joining our already extensive lineup, ESPN offers more hours of football than any other network.

where we needed to get it. What we need to do now is concentrate on leveraging it as best as we can and get the mix right. And also see if there is a way to take some of that money back through more efficient use of funds, through a better mix and better advertising.

So the overall budget may go down?

Yes. What we’re committed to is extending the leverage of the money. [We] need to continue to ride structural costs down and get that number lower.

How’s the mix changing this year?

The big change this year is there is a heavier mix of broadcast TV and cable [relative] to print than there has been in the past.

Why?

It’s really a creative issue. Relatively speaking, we have much more confidence in our television advertising, we have a good process that we’ve been working on for two years. We have more confidence in the work, and we don’t have that level of confidence in the print advertising. As a result there will be a very specific shift into more television.

There are reports that you may shift more than $100 million from print to television. True?

I would just say it’s a meaningful amount.

Roughly two-thirds of your $2 billion-plus budget went to television last year, and a little over half of the TV expenditure went to broadcast network [roughly $730 million]. Will the network segment continue to be the largest single piece of GM’s ad budget?

Yes. I can’t foresee a time, at least in my career, when network television as we know it—and I mean the expanded version of network, including CBS, NBC, ABC, Fox, Warner Brothers and Paramount—when they won’t have the lion’s share. And I’m not ruling out some of the things Parson and Barry Diller are trying to do.

What about cable and syndication?

When I came to GM we were spending almost no money in cable or syndication. Now we’re spending a lot in both, and by ranking we’re probably number one or two in those categories. And we’re spending more money locally. It’s really a matter of doing a better job of identifying where the business opportunities and problems lie and allocating funds accordingly.

What’s the fastest-growing TV segment in terms of ad spending and why?

In the last two years it’s been cable and syndication. But that’s only by a hair, because our spending in mainstream network television has increased too. Our budgets from 1995-97 increased substantially as we ramped up brand management.

Where do you spend most of your cable dollars?

It’s split pretty wide—TBS, TNT, USA, CNN. We’re probably in 12 or 15 networks. We started to see some cable networks almost as re-expressions of some of the things we used to do in print: smaller, better-defined audiences.

Does the current ad-buying process work?

I think the whole way television is bought over the next couple of years is going to change a lot.

How so?

Fundamentally, what’s happening with mainstream television, cable and syndication—from a performance standpoint it’s all moving closer to the middle. The mainstream television networks will always create the big-bang event. But if you look at network television, advertisers have paid more for a commodity that is decreasing in audience.

And thus less value?

No, it doesn’t mean it has less value. You could argue network television has more value than it did 15 years ago. On a cost-per-thousand basis it’s not the same, but your ability to generate a large audience in a fragmented media spectrum in some ways is more valuable.

Will the so-called optimizer formulas [which attempt to maximize reach in the most cost-effective manner] have a role in reshaping the buying process?

Yes. The move toward optimization and the rethinking of buying strategies based on what’s happening in the market are where the business is going. The big question is, are there ways to better identify additional value?

What are the issues there?

Commercialization is one. The networks are really loading up their better shows. The differences we normally used to see in effectiveness between the networks and syndication may not exist to the same degree. What does that really mean versus a highly targeted special-interest show on a network like A&E or The Golf Channel? The more narrow the content, the closer people relate to it. Does that overcome any communication disparity because it’s more highly commercialized?

What’s the answer?

I don’t really know, but we’ll be getting at those things over time. The answers are going to lead to reformatted strategies for how to do the buying. Everybody has focused on the mathematical optimizer formulas, but there will be a qualitative element added. So the optimization is going to come not in rating point expression, but in effective communication. We’re going to find a different way to define it.

We meaning the industry?

The industry is not going to get there itself. Some major advertisers will get there on their own. It may not be 100 percent right, but I'll take an 80 percent solution at this point.

Give me an example.

For example, we've done an enormous amount of research on the print side in the past two years, spending about $1 million that probably has gotten us $30 million or $40 million more in value. There are things we know about how to use magazines that the magazines don't know.

Are you doing similar research in the television area?

Yes, we're now doing it in television. We've already done it in spot TV, where we got into a dog fight with the spot-TV industry a few years back on commercial separation. We did research on the negative impact of using multiple spots in the same category in the same commercial pod. We adjusted our whole spot buying philosophy as a result of that, even took some money out of the market.

What did you find out?

Broadcasters were airing five or six car commercials in a pod. Their argument was that there are times when the car market gets hot and every dealer wants in; so in their view we created the problem. We were able to set up a formula that showed what happened to the communications value as a result of multiple car spots per pod. We basically said that if we're going to be in a pod with four other car spots, that was worth half of what they were going to ask.

What was the upshot?

With the help of the Television Bureau of Advertising, we were able to work ourselves through it.

Are the spot dollars back?

Yes, the spending there's been pretty robust, but there needs to be a certain amount of vigilance. Agencies used to do this.

Not now?

They don't do it anymore. The agencies have, in my opinion, moved into a trough in the media business—in terms of their level of learning to help create with clients and their ability to take clients to next level of professionalism.

That's quite an indictment.

This whole question of how agencies are executing media and serving clients is a big issue. A couple of months ago I told a group attending a conference that I felt agencies had walked away from their responsibility to be key advisers to their clients on issues of program content. I asked how many of them had seen South Park. Out of 500 people I don't think 50 raised their hands. How can you be in the media business and not have screened the most controversial show on television today?

How frequently are you blindsided by a show or environment you'd prefer not to be in?

Very rarely. But that's looking at the negative. The other question is, how often are you at the right place at the right time to take advantage of something when it gets hot? That's what the game is about. I've been in the business more than 30 years, and we don't know any more now than we did then about the impact of content on advertising effectiveness or how people think about us. And I lay that at the feet of the agencies.

How has GM's program mix changed since you've been here?

We probably used to spend 80 percent of our dollars on 10 programs on three networks. The mix now is much broader, due to our branding strategy and also due to fragmentation. Also, advertisers' media sensibilities and what they're willing to live with in terms of share are different now than they were 10 years ago. I think the agencies still are too focused on the mainstream networks, and they're not giving the kind of attention to the broader palette that they should.

As a major advertiser, do you feel you should have some control over the program content of shows your ads run in?

No, absolutely not. They don't tell us how to make cars, and we don't tell them how to make programs. We have the right to participate where we want to.

Is there a list of programs that GM won't advertise in?

No. Our content policy is that we have a general set of guidelines, and we deal with everything on an episodic basis.

So there's no GM hit list?

No. In putting together a buy, there a lot of factors. You look at content, and you don't want to buy into a program you think you're going to have to pull out of.

Any interest in programming ventures?

We've looked at some joint ventures. It's a tough way to get any real leverage over time. We have had a lot of conversations, but so far we haven't seen a deal structure that makes it worth our while to invest a lot of money so we have a lot of leverage. It would have to be a major deal structure.

So you're still looking?

Yes. There may be something we can do worldwide, or there may be ways we can work with DirecTV—which is part of GM—but so far we haven't seen the right formula. We're more interested in creating media efficiency and marketing... value than being content owners.

The network business is facing some of the toughest cost pressures in its history. The cost of sports, for example, has gone though the roof. How far will the networks get when they try to pass those cost increases on to advertisers?

I think the networks have more flexibility than other media companies to finesse a situation where they may have paid too much for a license fee and can’t get it out of the advertiser. I’m not too worried about it. I’m not happy about it, because I know they’re going ask a higher price, but there are a lot of places to go. But I also think they are very adept at creative deal-making, and so are we.

So you’re not concerned?

My biggest concern is not so much the pricing to us, but the degradation of the sport and viewer turn-off. I think there are some new strategies and paradigms in terms of dealing with high-profile items like professional sports that haven’t been explored yet. The issue is the value, not the price.

Degradation meaning overcommercialization?

Overcommercialization and also the falling out of love with the sport, sort of like what happened with baseball. Our concern about the strike was not the impact on ratings but the impact on the sport per se—and the sport’s inability or unwillingness to deal with its major supporters.

Deal with its major supporters in a different way?

Yes, I think in the long term you’re going to see a blending of licensing rights along with broadcasting rights and promotion rights. That’s what Ken Schnanzer and The Baseball Network tried to do. The whole idea was you would buy media rights and promotion rights as a package, where the whole would be greater than the sum of the parts, and you [would] extend the value.

Where have you created a package that blends media and promotion rights?

We took an early position in the Women’s National Basketball Association for media and promotion, and it’s sort of a little pilot of the way the business should be run in the future. It’s been enormously successful. We got more than our money’s worth. But you need to have planning resources and to do it long term. The whole structure of the way professional sports does media deals is going to have to change.

Some argue that GM is so big and so male-targeted that it’s basically a captive advertiser for a property like the NFL. True?

If you had asked me that five years ago, I would have said that’s an issue. But now it’s not. With professional sports, what they’ve done in order to get what they need is increase the inventory to the point that I don’t think we’re a captive at all. And our branding strategies have led to more specificity in our media planning and buying. Do we want the NFL? Yes, absolutely. Will we make a deal? Under the right conditions, we’ll make a deal.

Will network shares continue to drop?

I think it’s going to continue at some rate. I think the rate of fragmentation will come down a little bit. Technology is a fragmentation enhancer. A couple of years ago everyone was thinking about cable, and now everyone is thinking about electronic commerce and the Internet. The fact of the matter is people have only so much time to spend consuming media. So fragmentation is going to continue.

At what point does the network buy become unsustainable, with the share dwindling to a point that it can no longer support the price of programming or advertising?

I don’t think we’re going to get there. All of this is evolutionary. At some point a shift will come only as a result of some new learning that says, “Hey, this is worth more than I thought it was,” or where we finally get to the time where a rating point is a rating point and it’s worth less. There are some things that networks can do. The financial dynamics are such that networks—because of their coverage and scale—can pay license fees for major events. If those events were to go somewhere else, the scales might tip—but frankly I don’t see that happening.

You did a major Olympics deal with NBC that some have valued at close to $1 billion. What do you hope to accomplish with that deal?

The Olympics deal is a great deal—and it got better the day after we made it, given escalating rights costs. What it does is position us as the Olympic advertiser, probably in perpetuity, because we have option rights. So being able to tie up a high-profile event like the Olympics is really important.

You’re the sole domestic car advertiser as a result of that deal. What else does it give you?

I can’t confirm numbers, but it’s not just a media buy. We bought the [sponsorship] rights to the United States Olympic Committee and all the major governing bodies of 30 some Olympic teams. So it’s a pretty extraordinary marketing opportunity—not just during the Olympics but between the games as well. That’s where the leverage is.

Would you elaborate?

It’s not just a media buy. We’re going to want NBC’s and the USOC’s cooperation to do things over the course of the 10-year deal. So you’ve got to go in and establish a high core value, and then you’ve got to make sure you leave yourself the opportunity to grow and nurture your opportunities going forward. It goes back to my philosophy after 30 years in the business: Pigs get fat; hogs get slaughtered.
It's about branding, branding, branding.

"Whether it's branding our station or building effective tune-in topicals, we know it's not how big your budget is... it's how creative you are with it.

"As with most affiliates, we're always justifying our marketing budget but I never think twice about sending our promotion managers to PROMAX. They come back with not only new ideas and money-making programs, but a renewed energy for the craft of building bigger audiences for WNAB."

UPN pins hopes on ‘Love Boat’

Show reflects network’s new strategy of broadening appeal, building on existing audience

By Michael Stroud

U

PN is billing—and billboard-ing—its remake of the 70s hit show as “Romance+Ship-Iceberg=Love Boat: The Next Wave.” That formula can be seen on billboards across the nation, part of a multimillion-dollar advertising campaign to publicize the new series. Now the big question for the young network is whether the show equates to smoother sailing for UPN.

“Smooth Sailing”—the title of the first new episode of the Aaron Spelling classic, which airs today (April 13)—is what UPN hopes sticks in advertisers’ minds.

It’s been a tough year for UPN, which is owned by Viacom Inc. and Chris Craft. It lost its fifth-place position—and some of its affiliates—to rival WB. It also lost millions of dollars. And there was management turnover as well.

Now UPN CEO Dean Valentine and programming chief Tom Nunn think they have a formula for turning the ship around. One that builds on the potentially wide appeal of shows like Love Boat. No longer are they seeking a niche among subgroups of urban viewers.

Love Boat “is the first of a new wave of series that we believe will broaden our appeal and build on the audience we’ve already broadcast to,” Nunn says.

UPN has ordered six episodes of Love Boat: The Next Wave from Spelling Entertainment. Robert Urich stars as the captain of the Sun Princess. If the boat floats, the network plans to bolster Monday with more shows appealing to the women’s audience that UPN hopes to attract with Love Boat.

The likely candidates: Legacy, a family melodrama set in post-Civil War Kentucky; Hotel Del Sol, a resort show with characters reminiscent of Northern Exposure, or Boston Grace, a female cop show set in Boston.

Look for UPN to seek to capitalize on the broad demographics of Star Trek: Voyager on Wednesday with other drama/sci-fi offerings: Mercy Point, dubbed “ER in space,” and Martian Law, a kind of Wild West on Mars.

In keeping with UPN’s goal to broaden its demographic appeal, the network also will launch a new animated series based on the Dilbert comic strip that lampoons the workplace. “All the programs we are developing try their best not to exclude anybody,” Nunn says.

Certainly that was the intent of UPN’s Love Boat promotions at places like Viacom’s Blockbuster video stores, on billboards and on airplane flights—enough eyeball “impressions” for everybody in the U.S. to see a Love Boat promo four times, says Robert Rene, UPN executive vice president of marketing.

The show is carefully aimed at 90s mainstream sensibilities: the captain is newly divorced, and the first episode features two male friends assumed to be gay because they are staying in the honeymoon suite.

UPN is gambling that Love Boat will capture the imagination of advertisers as the networks prepare to unveil their fall schedules in May. If the show flies, Valentine and Nunn will have momentum for their fall lineup.

Of course, if the show doesn’t fly, the pressure on the new UPN team will redouble in September. Despite a rash of “retro” shows next fall, Love Boat’s appeal to the far-from-innocent Dawson’s Creek crowd is far from certain.

Even though the network spent million-

‘Money Hunt’ finds fame on PBS

Popular show featuring budding entrepreneurs started out on cable access

By Joe Schlosser

Three years ago, Miles Spencer and Cliff Enico taught a night-school course in Connecticut titled “How to Get Money to Start Your Own Business.”

Spencer, an investment banker, and Enico, a lawyer, had no trouble filling auditoriums. In fact, the two started to get into trouble with local authorities because their classes were too crowded.

“One night in Greenwich [Conn.] on a rainy, miserable night, not only was the room packed, but the fire marshal actually came down and warned us,” Spencer says. “Somebody raised their hand and asked why we didn’t have a TV show instead. And we just laughed.”

Spencer and Enico stopped laughing, ran with the idea and started Money Hunt on cable access in Norwalk, Conn.

A few years later, Spencer and Enico are hosts and producers of the popular series, now on PBS and seen in more than 130 markets, including 22 of the top 25. And the show may wind up on a top financial cable network, Spencer says.

Billed as The People’s Court meets Siskel & Ebert, Money Hunt features budding entrepreneurs who present their ideas and business plans to a panel of business experts. The experts evaluate their concepts in a ruthless, no-holds-barred manner.

“The cable show picked up a cultlike following in Norwalk, and to this day it is essentially the same format.”

‘Merlin’ does New York

NBC will unveil a multimillion-dollar revamping of its headquarters at 30 Rockefeller Plaza in New York as part of the world premiere for its miniseries, Merlin (right), airing April 26-27. The network’s stunts, including an attempt to pull the sword Excalibur from a stone, will be broadcast from a giant screen at Times Square.

On the move...

CBS has named Derek Reisfield president of its CBS New Media Group. Reisfield will be responsible for all aspects of CBS New Media—including joint ventures with CBS SportsLine and CBS MarketWatch as well as future growth strategies and joint ventures. He will report to Bill Korn, CBS strategic planning chief.

Daniel Barnathan has been promoted to senior vice president–network sales for the ABC Television Network. He will oversee advertising sales for early morning, late night, daytime and children’s programming. Barnathan formerly was vice president of prime time sales.

Filmmakers focus on TV

By Michael Stroud

Now it's Martin Scorsese's turn to try his hand at the small screen. The filmmaker behind film hits "Mean Streets" and "Taxi Driver" signed an exclusive, two-year development deal with ABC last week. Scorsese will develop a 13-episode series, as well as a miniseries.

"There are a number of stories Marty is interested in telling that last more than two hours," says Susan Lyne, ABC's executive vice president for movies and miniseries. ABC benefited from the director's existing production agreement with parent Walt Disney Co. Financial terms for the transaction, brokered by Creative Artists Agency, were not disclosed.

The deal is the latest example of filmmakers turning to TV. ABC has

...this is not just a transition from analog to digital"

Digital TV promises Americans a dazzling array of entertainment and information opportunities. Yet most people, industry insiders included, haven't fully grasped the way Digital TV is going to change the world.

"The new standard offers so much capability; it's beyond the notion of 'okay, you have digital pictures with nice sound and you can have some interactive content."

"Digital Television - A New Business Paradigm:
An A.T. Kearney Roundtable Discussion on the New Challenges and Opportunities in the Television Industry" is A.T. Kearney's third monograph on the current issues facing electronics manufacturers, broadcasters, content providers and other communications interests during the transition from analog to digital. This timely report features critical insights from eight renowned industry leaders at a recent roundtable table discussion held in Washington, D.C. Key issues include:

- Deployment of DTV broadcasting
- Consumer electronics
- Content & applications
- The new paradigm
- Regulatory issues

This highly anticipated monograph is required reading for senior decision-makers seeking to define the near-term impacts, opportunities and risks of DTV. • For more information and to reserve a copy of this report contact Frank Pietrucha, Communications Industries Practice, A.T. Revenue surges in 1997

Top five radio groups dominate with more than 30% of industry dollars

By Sara Brown

America's top five radio groups (by revenue) control more than 30% of radio revenue, according to 1997 data compiled by Duncan's American Radio for its Duncan's Radio Market Guide, 1998 Edition, to be released later this month.

CBS, Chancellor, Jacor, Capstar and Clear Channel collectively cleared more than $4 billion in revenue for '97. Revenue for the radio industry was up 9.3% for the year, to more than $12 billion—the biggest surge in radio revenue since 1994. That year the industry took in $9.8 billion, up 10.3% from 1993's $8.9 billion revenue.

Duncan's Mountain region (Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming) charted the biggest revenue gain in the country for the fourth year in a row. Stations in that region boasted an aggregate 15% increase. That increase was fueled in large part by the 18.3% revenue increase for stations in the Denver market, the year's top-growing radio market, according to Duncan's. All radio regions had a good year in '97, with the smallest regional growth as high as 9.6% (Southeast region Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, attracted Francis Ford Coppola, Barry Sonnenfeld, Barry Levinson, Jerry Bruckheimer and Oliver Stone. And last week, HBO debuted actor/director Tom Hanks's multipart From the Earth to the Moon.

ABC and other networks are luring Scorsese and other filmmakers by offering more time for character development, audiences in the tens of millions, and the potential for huge paydays if series and movies play well.

Primestar delays high-power service

Move is intended to appease regulators

By Price Colman

Less than a week after announcing plans to launch a high-power DBS service in mid-April, Primestar Inc. has encountered another in a series of snags and is backing off—at least for now.

Absent approval from the FCC and the Justice Department to obtain MCI's 28 transponder frequencies at 110 degrees west, Primestar planned to launch a streamlined 120-channel high-power service from the Tempo 2 satellite at 119 degrees on April 17.

But as soon as Primestar disclosed the timetable on April 1, the FCC hoisted a red flag. Although Primestar had outlined the 119-degree high-power plan as early as 1990, the FCC expressed concern that the company was going ahead without federal approval. Primestar is awaiting federal approvals for transfer of the 11 Tempo Satellite-held frequencies at 119 degrees and for the MCI frequencies at 110.

To appease the FCC, Primestar has delayed the 119 launch and has filed for an extension of the May 1 deadline for having a service up and running from that orbital slot. If the FCC denies the extension, Primestar will keep the 119 service, which already is running in tests, on hold. But if the FCC denies the extension, Primestar plans to go ahead with a service from 119 degrees as soon as possible.

The FCC's concern apparently stems from its interpretation that Primestar needs commission approval to offer a retail DBS service using leased transponder capacity. Primestar contends that there is ample precedent that it does not. But rather than risk incensing the FCC with the 110 slot at stake, Primestar has opted for diplomacy over confrontation.

The delay is the latest obstacle in Primestar's rocky road to consolidating its cable partners' interests into a single entity, launching a high-power service and becoming a publicly traded company. Primestar's opponents, including competitors DirecTV and EchoStar, are lobbying hard to prevent its acquisition of the 110 slot, contending that the DBS service is simply a stalking horse for the cable industry and won't provide true competition.

DirecTV prowl for providers

GTE added to SBC and Bell Atlantic for telco triumvirate

By Price Colman

DirecTV has signed up GTE as its newest ally in the marketing-distribution arena, creating a kind of telco triumvirate with SBC Communications and Bell Atlantic.

But don't expect it to remain a triumvirate for long. As DirecTV looks to capture further market share and to preempt cable companies in signing new customers, the company will try to fill any remaining gaps in its growing network of local service providers.

"We're out there talking to a variety of companies," says DirecTV spokesman Bob Marsocci.

The marketing-distribution deals struck thus far with local telephone companies complement DirecTV's robust retail channels and are fast replacing the AT&T backing that the company had until recently.

But the new telco allies offer two key benefits largely unavailable through the retailers: the opportunity to be part of a package of bundled services and an experienced customer support mechanism.

Like SBC and Bell Atlantic, GTE plans to offer DirecTV as part of a telecommunications package that includes local and long-distance telephone service and Internet access. Financial terms weren't disclosed, but Marsocci acknowledges that the structure is essentially the same as it is with the other telcos: DirecTV shares a percentage of revenue from each subscriber with the telco. The contract includes incentives for the telcos to achieve certain subscriber levels, at which time a larger percentage kicks in.

GTE intends to focus initially on a limited number of metropolitan markets in selling DirecTV. Although it offers local phone service in 27 states, GTE's largest markets include Los
Time Warner puts fat price on telco unit

$175 million stock sale indicates $1.7 billion valuation

By John M. Higgins

Time Warner Inc. is expected to seek a huge valuation for the competitive local telephone unit it’s taking public.

Time Warner Telecom Inc. filed last Monday to sell $175 million of stock to the public. The company would not say what percentage of the company that represents or the proposed price per share. However, cable and telephone executives familiar with the deal say that the sale will be a minority stake of some 10% of the equity, valuing the company at about $1.7 billion.

That may seem like a lot compared with the $55 million in revenue and $37.1 million in negative cash flow that the unit has generated. But it’s on par with the valuation of similar competitive local exchange carriers (CLECs), reflecting two things: the big checks that Time Warner and partners US West Inc. and Newhouse Broadcasting Inc. have written to build out the company’s network and the telephone unit’s relatively strong progress toward establishing a solid business.

The deal highlights cable operators’ increasing interest in the telephone business. Embarrassing missteps prompted MSOs largely to back away from their grand boasts a few years ago about taking on the Baby Bells. But a few operators, particularly Cox Communications Inc. and Cablevision Systems Corp., have quietly kept their hands in—focusing largely on capturing lucrative business customers but also looking at the more difficult and capital-intensive residential business.

In addition to opening a new avenue to financing construction of telephone plant, the filing puts the spotlight on a big asset tucked away deep inside Time Warner and US West and commonly overlooked by investors—Time Warner Telecom Inc. The $11 billion sale of a similar company—publicly held but MSO-controlled Teleport Communications Group Inc.—is leaving Tele-Communications Inc., Comcast Corp., and Cox Communications Inc. with $2 billion—$3 billion of AT&T Corp. stock each.

According to a Securities and Exchange Commission filing, Time Warner Telecom has begun telephone service in 14 of its planned 19 markets. All are cities where Time Warner or its Time Warner Entertainment/Advance Newhouse partnership operates cable systems, allowing the CLEC to piggyback on the cable operations’ existing fiber capacity.

Created in 1993, Time Warner Telecom initially was designed to allow the systems to bundle video and telephone services together to cable customers. But after that approach proved prohibitively expensive and entangled in a regulatory morass, Time Warner Telecom switched gears, hired new management and decided to go solely after business customers—much like Teleport and like MFS Communications, which recently was sold to long-distance upstart WorldComm.

The build has been expensive. Time Warner Telecom has burned through $484 million laying fiber and other wiring plus expensive switches to handle traffic. The company has run through another $250 million in operating losses. Further, another $300 million in capital spending is budgeted for 1998 and 1999. Revenue to date: $90 million.

But that may not matter much. Similar companies are being valued at billions of dollars in the stock market, with investors expecting the heavy initial spending to slow down after the first several years and revenue to kick in heavily as CLECs undercut incumbent phone companies. One Wall Street executive says that start-up phone companies are generally valued at 1.5 to three times their invested capital.

Time Warner Telecom is expected to seek a valuation toward the higher end of that range. Now in its fifth year, the company has capital spending that isn’t growing much—running $50 million in 1994, jumping to $140 million—$145 million in 1995 and 1996, dipping to $127 million last year and expected to be about $150 million in 1998 and 1999.

At the same time, losses have dropped from $60 million in 1996 to $37 million last year.

The partners stopped advancing equity to Time Warner Telecom last summer, judging the operation healthy enough to bear debt. So the $103 million advanced since last July has been in the form of loans rather than equity investments.
TNT revamping its image

Network promotes top-drawer films, originals, 'ER' in aiming for upscale demos

By Donna Petrozzello

urner Network Television pitched itself as a blue-chip cable network to advertisers and media buyers at its upfront sales presentation in New York last week.

"TNT's programming is boutique, not mass production," says Bradley Siegel, president of TNT and Turner Classic Movies. "In a lot of ways this is more desirable product than is on the broadcast networks."

TNT is offering premieres of theatricals including "Fargo," "Shine," "Mighty Aphrodite" and "Hamlet" during its 1998-99 season. Siegel says TNT expects these films will draw viewers who have slightly higher incomes and more education and who are more likely to live in urban regions than the typical cable viewer.

TNT also is counting on "ER" to attract affluent viewing households when it debuts weekends this fall at 7 p.m. TNT is expecting the drama to drive viewers to the network's prime time block as well.

"TNT represents a more eclectic viewing audience who are somewhat better educated, somewhat above average income and who generally have a greater number of persons living in their households," says Joe Uva, president of entertainment sales and marketing at Turner Broadcasting Sales. While TNT's mainstream audience is still adults 25-54, the network is trying to skew toward the younger end of that spectrum, Uva says.

"ER is the most desirable off-net drama on television, not just on cable," Siegel contends. "Seinfeld is way up there, but right behind it is ER." TNT will offer seven minutes of inventory to national advertisers during "ER" and three minutes of local available to operators.

For the 1998-99 season, TNT's original movies will include performances by actors such as Kathleen Turner, James Garner and Burt Reynolds and involve producers such as Quincy Jones.

In 1999, TNT will debut an original series from director/producer Oliver Stone. TNT also will replace its sci-fi series Babylon 5 in prime time next year with the new Crusade, which is expected to draw a similarly "smart, young, above-average-income" audience, Siegel says.

"Our four-part strategy involves getting more premium, high-quality audience favorites in terms of theatricals, airing more specials and more network premieres," Siegel says. "That's how we'll capture more of the advertising dollars aimed at broadcast TV, and that's how we'll claim higher rates. It's not just about reach—it's about the quality of the environment in which the program is shown and the quality of the network that advertisers are in."

Turner pumps up original production

Turner Network Television has pumped up its original-production budget by 146% and has announced plans for two new series and more than two dozen original movies during the 1998-99 season. TNT's production costs over two years are expected to be $175 million-$200 million.

In 1998, TNT will premiere 13 original movies—and at least that many in 1999, says Julie Weitz, TNT's VP of original programming. Some of TNT's selections for the upcoming season are a departure from the programming norm, according to Weitz; the network is taking on dark comedies, thrillers and controversial subjects.

NBA great and future TV host Earvin "Magic" Johnson makes his debut as executive producer with Quincy Jones on the original TNT feature Passing Glory, which tells the true story of a black priest who uses basketball to challenge the conventions of a segregated town. The program is based on scripts by John Sayles and Harold Sylvester.

Film director Oliver Stone marks his entry into TV drama with Witchblade, an action/adventure series depicting a New York City detective whose search for justice brings her into contact with a living weapon. TNT will introduce Witchblade with a feature movie in early 1999. The series will premiere as a weekly one-hour series in fourth quarter 1999.

Other feature movies include Legalse, about a high-profile murder case, starring James Garner, Kathleen Turner and Gina Gershon; The Color of Water, about a black man's exploration of the life of his white, Jewish mother, based on James McBride's best-selling memoir; Purgatory West of the Pecos, a western-style thriller starring Sam Shepard and Eric Roberts; and Hard Time, the first in a trilogy of films from Larry Levinson Productions that will star Burt Reynolds.

TNT also will debut the sci-fi thriller series Crusade, which will replace its Babylon 5 in prime time, starting in 1999. Babylon 5 will continue airing at 6 p.m. ET on weeknights next year. Crusade launches with aliens seeking revenge and aiming their wrath at human beings by releasing a biogenic plague. TNT will continue producing Babylon 5 through 1999, Weitz says.

S-A, Sun software deal advances set-top movement

PersonalJava software agreement furthers S-A position in market, opens door to broader consumer applications

By Price Colman

The cable industry’s digital set-top-box push gained momentum last week with Scientific-Atlanta’s decision to license PersonalJava as an additional software component on Explorer 2000 boxes.

PersonalJava, developed by Sun Microsystems, is what is called “middleware” or an application environment. Like HTML (hyper-text markup language) and JavaScript—both of which already are incorporated in the Explorer 2000—PersonalJava is the programming language framework for consumer software applications.

The licensing agreement between S-A and Sun is important for three reasons:

- It positions S-A to supply Explorers to the same cable MSOs that have ordered General Instrument (GI) advanced DCT-series set-tops in which PersonalJava is the primary middleware. S-A already has letter-of-intent orders from many of the same MSOs, but the orders generally are smaller than those from GI.
- It furthers cross-platform compatibility, meaning that an MSO that selects a particular operating system, such as Windows CE or PowerTV, won’t be locked into selecting a specific programming environment. That, in turn, opens the door to broader development of consumer software applications.
- It helps to advance a commodity model for advanced digital set-tops, putting downward pressure on box prices that should speed deployment of the boxes and accompanying products and services.

“What we’re all desperately trying to do is figure out how to appropriately decouple the operating system from the applications,” says Tom Elliot, Cable Television Laboratories vice president. “We don’t want to get into a situation where—to make a personal computer analogy—if you use a particular microprocessor, you have to use a particular operating system. It’s the same with applications and operating systems.”

That decoupling is much of the focus of CableLabs’ and the cable industry’s OpenCable initiative. OpenCable aims at establishing set-top specifications that would eventually translate into standards permitting any and all players to participate. It’s a strategy designed to defuse the kind of “holy war” of WinTel (Microsoft Windows—Intel) versus the rest of Silicon Valley.

Cable and computer industries envision the digital cable platform—enabled by advanced set-tops—as the seedbed for a variety of new products and services to capture consumer dollars.

In a development related to the S-A/PersonalJava licensing, set-top box operating system developer PowerTV says it will port PersonalJava to the PowerTV operating system. That means MSOs that choose the PowerTV operating system for the digital set-tops they deploy, regardless of whether those are Explorer 2000 boxes, will be able to use PersonalJava middleware.

While the digital set-top picture is still cloudy in some respects, it's gradually becoming clearer. Among key developments:

Tele-Communications Inc. in late December 1997 received a $4.5 billion, 15 million-set-top-box order from GI with the commitment to buy 5 million—11 million of those devices over the next three to five years. Smaller orders came from Time Warner, MediaOne Group, Comcast, Cox, Cablevision Systems, Jones Intercable, Shaw and Rogers Communications.

TCI subsequently announced that it would license the Windows CE operating system and PersonalJava for at least 5 million of the GI boxes it has ordered. TCI Chairman John Malone, in keeping with the OpenCable initiative, recently said that TCI is keeping the door open to other operating systems, including Aperios, which Sony is developing in conjunction with GI.

A committee encompassing movie studios and consumer electronics manufacturers, with support from the cable industry, recently agreed on copyright protection guidelines for digital programming.

‘Rugrats’ in any language

Nickelodeon has signed a slate of global broadcasting and syndication agreements for its hit cartoon strip Rugrats.
The channel has signed a carriage agreement with France 3, one of France’s largest terrestrial broadcasters, to air the entire Rugrats library of 107 episodes. Nickelodeon also has signed with Copyright Promotions Licensing Group in France to act as the Rugrats merchandising and promotion agent throughout the country. CPLG also will seek licensing partners to manufacture Rugrats merchandise in France.

In a separate deal with Creators Syndicate, the international newspaper syndicate, Nickelodeon has released a new comic strip featuring Rugrats characters for worldwide distribution. The deal marks the first international comic-strip syndication agreement for Nickelodeon, according to the network. The strip is slated for daily and Sunday distribution.

“We now have a great way to reach parents through an original comic strip based on the hit show, which is currently seen in over 70 countries,” says Kathleen Hricik, senior vice president of Nick’s international program enterprises. “The strip also will give kids a compelling reason to open up the newspaper every day.”

CableACEs bow out

After 19 years, awards discontinued

By Donna Petrozzello

The CableACE Awards have sung their swan song.

In a meeting in New York last week, the board of governors for the National Academy of Cable Programming and the National Cable Television Association Satellite Network Committee voted to discontinue the National CableACEs after 19 years.

John Hendricks, chairman of Discovery Communications and NACP chairman, says the ACES “achieved the objective” of stepping up recognition by the TV industry and the public of cable network programming. More than two-thirds of board members voted to drop the ACES, he reports.

“We created the ACES when cable networks were fearful and insecure, but I think people feel as though cable programming is becoming well-recognized,” Hendricks says. “For the past 19 years, the ACES have drawn attention to cable. The time is right to declare mission accomplished.”

Sandra Oh won an ACE last year for her role in HBO’s "ArliSS."

Hendricks rests his case on the fact that basic and premium cable programs are winning a larger number of Emmy Awards each year: “Cable has finally started winning its fair share of Emmys.”

In 1997, cable programs took home 28 Emmys; HBO’s original feature films stole the lion’s share. The network received 90 Emmy nominations and won 19 awards, making it second to NBC but ahead of CBS. HBO also garnered 21 ACES from 41 nominations.

Cable programs also are winning more Peabody Awards and Columbia University duPont Awards, Hendricks says.

Hendricks quashed rumors that the NACP board and the NCTA committee were inclined to bury the ACES this year because HBO had threatened to pull out of the ceremony.

“HBO had always said it would go along with whatever decision the board of governors reached,” Hendricks says. “We’ve been considering ending the ACES for the past three or four years.” Last year’s CableACE Awards ceremony was held in November at the Los Angeles Wiltern Theater.

Although the CableACEs are no longer, the NACP is discussing establishing awards to “complement emerging cable networks.” Hendricks says the group will talk about it at the NCTA in May.

Heavenly ratings for HBO

The first two episodes of HBO’s 12-part series From the Earth to the Moon garnered a 12.8 rating/18 share for the 8-10 p.m. telecast on Sunday, April 5. The series beat ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox, according to Nielsen Media Research data. Separately, HBO says that Nielsen data show the first episode, airing at 8-9 p.m., earning an 11.4/17, and the second hour registering a 14.1/19. From the Earth to the Moon was available to non-HBO subscribers as part of a free “preview” weekend.

All health, all the time

Discovery Networks is poised to launch Discovery Health Channel, a 24-hour service featuring real-life medical dramas, news about health trends and general health news programs. Discovery is making Discovery Health available for analog and digital carriage. The channel will join the Discovery Showcase Networks lineup, which includes Discovery Civilization, Discovery Kids, Discovery Home & Leisure, Discovery Science and Discovery Wings.

Top dogs

Animal Planet has fashioned something akin to an Olympics contest for dogs. Later this year, the network debuts Animal Planet National Dog Championships, a three-part special highlighting dog shows in Baltimore, Houston and Phoenix. There will be behind-the-scenes stories about dogs and their owners, interviews with hairdressers for dogs and footage from a dog’s-eye-view camera. The special is sponsored by IAMs pet foods.

Tennis partners

For the fifth straight year, USA Network will be serving up the French Open 1998 tennis tournament from France. Thirty-two hours of live tournament coverage will be broadcast from May 25 to June 5. USA also has locked in coverage of the 1998 U.S. Open tennis matches, giving the network 113 hours of tennis coverage this year. That’s more than any other U.S. broadcast or cable network, according to USA.

Rock in Russia

MTV Networks has a multiyear licensing agreement with Russia-based Biz Enterprises to develop and launch a custom-tailored 24-hour MTV for Russia. The new Moscow-based music channel is expected to launch in the fourth quarter. Advertiser-supported and Russian-language-based, MTV Russia will be distributed via VHF and UHF terrestrial frequencies that reach more than 10 million households.

CAB: Ad revenue milestones in 2000

The Cable Advertising Bureau predicts that cable ad revenue will exceed $12 billion by 2000 and will break the $10 billion mark next year from combined network, regional sports and local cable ad sales. The predictions were released in a CAB tip sheet for cable advertisers.

CAB also predicts, based on Nielsen data, that basic cable’s average prime time U.S. household share for the full 1997-98 broadcast season—September 1997 through mid-May 1998—will hit 35.7, an all-time high for the industry. Likewise, says the association, basic cable’s average prime time rating will hit 21.6 with 21.2 million households during the same TV season.

CAB also anticipates that 80% of U.S. households will receive ad-supported cable networks by April 1999 and that the average number of subscribers per network among basic’s top 40 networks will reach 60 million by 2000. —Donna Petrozzello

Hicks Muse and Cisneros eye Argentina’s CEI

A fund controlled by Dallas-based investment firm Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst and Venezuelan media conglomerate Cisneros Group has emerged as the most likely buyer for a stake in Argentine media juggernaut CEI Citicorp Holdings. Citibank plans to sell its stake in CEI, which, in association with fellow investors Telefonica and TCI, owns an array of cable and broadcast holdings. Sources in New York and Buenos Aires indicate that the Hicks Muse/Cisneros fund will take only a 15%-20% stake in the company. One securities analyst says a 20% stake in CEI could fetch up to $300 million.

Canal+ ponders equity float for Italy’s Tele+

French pay-TV operator Canal+ is considering a plan by investment bank Lehman Bros. to float 20% of its Italian pay channel, Tele+, on the Milan stock exchange. The float would solve the funding issue for Canal+, which owns 90% of Tele+, but wants to reduce its ownership by half. Sources say 20% of Tele+ could raise $250 million-$275 million. —Michael Katz
Intel, Microsoft strike accord on Intercast

Computer companies to cooperate on enhanced digcasting

By Richard Tedesco

Intel Corp. and Microsoft Corp. are teaming up to promote enhanced broadcast services by getting behind Intercast and merging their respective interactive TV initiatives.

Intercast had opened a substantial lead on Microsoft’s enhanced digital broadcasting effort, which was set to debut as part of Windows 98 later this year. As the initial step in the new alliance, Intercast will be customized for incorporation in the WebTV for Windows, according to Michael Richmond, Intel business unit manager for broadcast products.

For Intel, the deal means a broad new distribution platform for Intercast. It also means a unified approach with Microsoft that’s intended to encourage creation of content for the enhanced broadcast service across a larger programmer base. “It’s important for the broadcast industry to know that the PC industry is working toward the same goal,” Richmond says. “There have been developers hanging back because they didn’t know which direction to take.”

NBC, MTV, CNN and The Weather Channel are among the dozen or so programmers that have developed digital content for delivery via Intercast through television stations’ vertical blanking interval. Microsoft has been working on a similar solution that it has been touting as superior to Intercast.

Now both companies hope that the convergence of their enhanced broadcast efforts will help push the category. “Intel and Microsoft were evangelizing two different technologies,” says Craig Mundie, group vice president of Microsoft’s digital TV group, who adds that the effort to “morph” his company’s technology with Intercast has been in the works for some time.

An NBC source says that the network remains “platform-agnostic” and plans to cooperate with both companies on enhanced broadcast content.

The idea is to migrate Intercast over other Microsoft platforms, with inclusion in the existing set-top version of WebTV “within the scope of us working together,” as Richmond puts it. Ultimately, Intel envisions Intercast as a service to be accessed on a TV in a family room rather than via PC. For now, “We’re using desktop PCs as a platform so we can get a real audience,” Richmond says.

Microsoft effectively buys into an established service, notwithstanding the limited reach of Intercast (which Intel declines to reveal). PC users must have high-end Pentiums equipped with $150 tuner cards to receive the service. WebTV claims 300,000 subs for its monthly $19.95 service, which requires purchase of one of two set-top boxes priced at $99 and $199.

WebTV eventually figures to migrate into a high-speed Internet cable service via digital set-tops that Microsoft is designing for Tele-Communications Inc. And Intercast, along with other services that Microsoft and Intel create, figures to migrate there along with it.

Microsoft and Intel now can be expected to work cooperatively on the digital version of Intercast that Intel and PBS are preparing to introduce in a test this fall (B&C, April 6).

The eyes behind Eye on People

When Geoffrey Darby first ventured into entertainment programming for children, he envisioned a show in which kids dump green slime on each other. When he conceived a children's educational show for public TV, one lesson showed what happens to things that are flushed down the toilet.

Darby's approach to television programming is a robust blend of humor, wonder and risk. Now president of CBS Eye on People, he began his career bouncing offbeat ideas for children's programming to mainstream programmers. Not only did his ideas stick, they earned top ratings and syndication deals.

A native of Canada, Darby quit college a few credits shy of graduating to take a job at CJOH-TV Ottawa. There he created You Can't Do That on Television, in which kids ruled the set and participated in outrageous pranks and contests. The show earned top ratings and a syndication deal throughout Canada. It also affirmed Darby's conviction that kids, like adults, deserve to be entertained and to own the medium on their terms.

"Kids deserve a place to go and be themselves," he says. "When we made You Can't Do That, parents felt that good children's television taught them how to read and spell. I say that's balderdash. Our goal was to express to kids that we like you just the way you are."

You Can't Do That caught the attention of Geraldine Laybourne, who scooped it up for Nickelodeon in 1984. At the time, Nick was a nascent, part-time network for which Laybourne oversaw acquisitions and scheduling. The show was a hit on Nickelodeon, and green slime became one of the network's trademark gags.

From CJOH-TV, Darby emigrated south to Boston and landed a job producing children's shows for public broadcaster WGBH-TV. Again, he thwarted conventional ideas in Don't Look Now, a show that tapped kids' curiosity about everyday life and was one of the all-time highest-rated children's programs.

With two ratings winners to his credit, Darby was recruited by Laybourne to join Nickelodeon in 1985 as an executive producer. Finally, he had "a whole network to play with where there weren't competing agendas from different types of programming," he says.

At Nickelodeon, Darby found his niche and promoted the "kids first" agenda that Laybourne and other Nickelodeon visionaries held dear. He helped to create Double Dare, Rated K for Kids. and Eureka's Castle. all CableACE winners.

"At Nick, I had a place to follow my philosophy, and in cable you can start something from scratch," he says. "You can experiment and find out what works."

During his seven years with Nickelodeon, Darby watched the network embrace a variety of children's shows. He picked up Ren & Stimpy from animator and fellow Ottawan John Kricfalusi. Darby also oversaw the launches of Nick at Nite, the retro-sitcom channel, and Nick at Nite Overnight.

But as his role at Nick led him further from the creative process, Darby sought a more hands-on programming role and took an offer to helm Whittle Communications' start-up Medical News Network in 1992. The closed-circuit, video-on-demand network served 5,500 doctors nationwide.

Although it shuttered two years after its launch, Medical News Network gave Darby a chance to create an interactive product in the early 1990s, when the Internet was beginning to catch on. As one of the few programmers who also had experience with interactive programming, Darby was tapped by Viacom in 1994 to lead the Paramount Media Kitchen. The venture explored how cable networks and Viacom's other properties could best exploit the Internet and interactive opportunities.

In 1997, his interest was piqued by CBS's cable venture CBS Eye on People. Not only was the network a start-up, but it offered Darby an opportunity to return to cable TV programming and gave him a network to brand as "people-centric."

Darby joined CBS Eye on People in January 1997 as president. Since the network's inception, he has helped to launch such shows as Best of Us, which profiles extraordinary feats performed by ordinary people, and Final Cut, a personality interview show.

With commitments from MSOs for 10 million subscribers and DBS carriage on DirecTV and PrimeStar—and a deal with EchoStar imminent—Darby wants to bring several of Eye's originals to strip in 1999. And, despite his penchant for start-ups, he expects CBS Eye on People to hold his interest for at least eight more years.

In Brief

The National Association of Broadcasters said a record 104,805 people attended its convention in Las Vegas last week. That total is a 4.5% increase over last year.

Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) is thinking about pushing the FCC to put a time limit on its planned inquiry into the issue of free airtime for political candidates. Speaking at the NAB convention last week, Burns said he does not want to leave the issue dangling and added that he plans to pursue the idea of a time limit with FCC Chairman William Kennard.

Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) wants the FCC to set a mandatory HDTV minimum. In a letter this month to FCC commissioners, Helms worried that stations will deliver multiple channels of standard-definition pictures: “A multitude of standard-definition programs may line the networks’ pockets, but it will not attract viewers.” First Amendment advocates urge the Media Institute to deregulate the broadcasting industry as it moves into the digital age. “[T]he current system of free over-the-air television is a major public interest benefit that should not be jeopardized by burdensome requirements,” says a Media Institute statement. The so-called Gore commission on the public interest requirements of digital broadcasters meets again on Tuesday (April 14) to continue considering whether broadcasters should face additional public service obligations once they convert to digital. The paper, written by Professor Laurence Winer for the Media Institute’s Public Interest Council, critiques a recommendation submitted earlier to the Gore commission by the Aspen Institute think tank. The recommendation proposes four ways that digital broadcasters can pick up more public interest obligations.

Comedy Central has decided to move up the South Park episode revealing the identity of Cartman’s father. After an episode on April Fools’ Day that failed to deliver on its promise of settling the paternity issue, the channel received more than 3,000 e-mails and phone calls from fans expressing their displeasure at being short-changed and saying that they could not wait until May 20 to find out. Those fans have increasing clout, with back-to-back airings of the show topping the basic cable ratings chart again in the first and second spots. Comedy Central will move the episode out of the May sweeps to an April 22 slot. Sources theorize that the absentee dad is Denver Broncos quarterback John Elway. The reasoning: Among the suspects is the entire 1989 AFC championship team, and South Park’s creators are “huge” Elway fans.

Sources say USA Network executives are in negotiations with Universal for a package of films that includes such recent films as “Primary Colors,” “Mercury Rising” and “The Boxer.” Executives at both USA and Universal had no comment. Separately USA and Columbia TriStar Television Distribution have struck a deal that brings such theatrical releases as “Seven Years in Tibet” and “Wild Things” to USA Network. Also with CTD, USA Network’s other cable entity, Sci-Fi Channel, has an investment in Quaestus Management Corp., founding ARI Network Services Inc., an electronic commerce firm, and other companies. He will remain chairman, with an annual salary of $300,000, according to the documents.

Weening has a history as a broadcast owner and operator and currently runs his own broadcast consulting firm, Stratford Research.

In the prospectus, the company lays out the acquisition strategy, which has baffled brokers in the past year. The company says it is focusing on small- to midsize market clusters in four regions (Midwest, Southeast, Southwest and Northeast).

The focus on the small and medium makes sense, according to the prospectus, because consolidation there would give the company’s stations an advantage over largely unconsolidated competitors.

Also included in the filing are the company’s pro forma results for 1997. The group had $106.2 million in revenue and an operating loss of $3.5 million. Pro forma broadcast cash flow for the year was $27.7 million. Long-term debt is $157.7 million.

Although still undecided on the amount and price of its upcoming stock offering, Cumulus hopes the proceeds will help finance pending acquisitions and long-term debt.

The filing is currently under examination by the SEC, after which a price and amount of shares to be offered will be determined.

Weening and Dickey did not return phone calls. Underwriters at Bear Stearns & Co. refused to comment.

Also on file with the SEC is Capstar Broadcasting’s IPO proposal. Expected soon: Citadel Communications’ application.

UPN goes to five

It’s official. UPN announced late Thursday that it will expand to five nights a week of prime time programming during the fall season, part of a big-bucks bet to reverse this year's ratings slide. UPN will launch Thursday programming on Oct. 8 and Friday programming on Oct. 9 in the 8-10 p.m. time slot.

UPN has vastly increased its development budget this year in a bid to improve ratings; it’s fallen behind rival WB, which is now ranked fifth. “Our goal is to continue to expand into a full- fledged broadcast network,” Valentine said.

The announcement came as UPN gears up for the first major programming launch of the Dean Valentine regime, tonight’s (April 13) launch of Love Boat: The Next Wave. UPN debuted in January 1995 with two prime time nights, Monday and Tuesday, and added Wednesday in March 1996.

In the driver's seat

What's good for General Motors is good for television. That is the message in this week's cover story (see page 22) from Phil Guarascio, who speaks with the authority of a $2.1 billion advertising budget. What's good for television is that the auto manufacturer is moving millions of dollars, perhaps $100 million, into television. That boost could become even more important, since Guarascio says that the overall ad budget probably will go down as the company tries to get more bang for its buck.

The reason for the increased ad dollars to TV, says Guarascio, is that "we have much more confidence in our television advertising." Network broadcasters should be particularly buoyed. With shares declining and competition increasing, it is easy to start hanging crepe. Not so fast, says Guarascio: "I can't foresee a time, at least in my career, when network television ... won't have the lion's share." In that share he is including The WB and Paramount and not ruling out efforts by Barry Diller and Bud Paxson. "You could argue network television has more value than it did 15 years ago," he says. "On a cost-per-thousand basis it's not the same, but your ability to generate a large audience in a fragmented media spectrum in some ways is more valuable.

Cable and syndication—the fastest-growing category for GM—and local stations also are benefiting from the company's increasing confidence in television, with spending boosts planned in all those categories. We hope the CAB and TVB are taking notes.

All the right moves

What we like about wbtv's decision to move The Jerry Springer Show from 4 p.m. back to its original 10 a.m. slot is that it was voluntary and that it put community welfare ahead of short-term financial gain.

The station resisted when criticized by local protesters, who believed that the time change put the often-volatile and sexually oriented Springer before an audience of unsupervised kids. The protests gathered outside the station, threatening to boycott wbtv shows and advertisers. And the station resisted when local government—including the Detroit City Council and Board of Education—weighed in against it.

Springer was a winner at 4 p.m., giving wbtv the boost it needed to take over the number-one spot in early-evening news. And, as station vice president and general manager Alan Frank noted, ratings are not abstract; they represent real people.

Yet Frank sounded genuinely troubled when Nielsen numbers confirmed that many of those real people watching Springer were children. And ultimately the station's own research indicated that continuing Springer at 4 p.m. could hurt it in the eyes of the community.

We don't fault the protesters for picketing or the city government for protesting any more than we fault wbtv for putting Springer on in the afternoon. All acted as they saw fit. Perhaps the most important remark by the local mother who led the attack on Springer and wbtv was not a threat but an expression of disappointment in wbtv.

Tip O'Neill, the late Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, used to say that all politics is local. Perhaps all broadcasting is as well.

P.S. While we're on the subject of Jerry Springer, a tip of the editorial visor to producer-distributor USA Networks, which—despite the record ratings—decided two weeks ago to tone down the brawling and encourage stations to discourage children from tuning in. Tough call, but a smart one.
