Networks lose ground on NFL

Fox, ABC, ESPN suffer ratings declines; some blame baseball’s late-season resurgence

By Steve McClellan and Joe Schlosser

F or the first month of the NFL season, the TV picture isn’t good: Ratings are down and advertising is soft. And baseball’s resurgence may be part of the problem.

The first four weeks of the 1998-99 NFL season have been less than stellar for the four networks carrying the games. The networks, which anted up $1.8 billion for the latest NFL contracts, are facing decreased ratings after the first month of NFL action.

ESPN is down 18% from the ratings of former rightholder TNT; Fox, down 3% from last season; CBS ratings are flat compared with last year’s rightsholder, NBC; and ABC is off 15% from last year’s 15.2 rating, the network’s lowest-rated year ever.

It’s hard to say why, but nearly everyone was taken by surprise. “It’s an unanticipated drop,” says John Lazarus, senior vice president, TN Media.

ABC, which paid $4.4 billion to renew its long-running Monday Night Football franchise, is not panicking. ABC spokesman Mark Mandel says it’s too early to judge MNF ratings because of variables—such as the hour-earlier start time—8 p.m. ET: “It’s only four weeks into a new start time after 28 years of people watching it at 9 p.m. On top of that, there has been an incredible frenzy surrounding the Clinton-Lewinsky story and the remarkable baseball season.”

Mandel says that while MNF ratings may be down, the ABC network has benefited as a whole from its jump start on the season.

CBS, which recentered the pigskin game this season by grabbing NBC’s AFC package for more than $4 billion, is the only network not down after four weeks. The Tiffany Network has averaged 8.7 through four contests this season, equal to NBC’s numbers during the same period last year. CBS has shown an improvement in total households and a slight climb in viewers aged 18 and older compared with NBC’s first month last year.

Many believe NFL viewer declines are the result of baseball’s late-season resurgence. With the Mark McGwire/Sammy Sosa home-run chase and other good story lines, baseball is enjoying increased viewership.

ESPN drew an 8.1 rating for the Giants/Cubs playoff game last Monday, the second-highest-rated baseball game ever on the cable channel. And close to 1.5 million more viewers watched the game on either WGN-TV Chicago or KTVU-TV San Francisco, bringing the total number of viewers who were watching the baseball game last Monday to 7.5 million.

At the same time, ABC’s Monday Night Football matchup last week between Detroit and Tampa Bay turned out to be the second-lowest-rated in the 29-year history of MNF. The game drew an 11.1 rating, according to Nielsen Media Research.

According to advertising executives, the networks have registered increases of 8%–10%, only half what they were hoping for. And, ad executives say, there is plenty of inventory still available. Regular-season Sunday games on Fox and CBS are said to be priced at $175,000-$200,000 per 30-second spot. ABC’s Monday Night Football games are said to be priced at $325,000-$350,000 per 30-second unit.

At least two big NFL sponsors pulled out this year, agency sources say, including McDonald’s and TrueValue Hardware.

TN Media’s Lazarus predicts that the pool of NFL network TV ad dollars may be down by as much as 10% this year, which he says “is the difference between where they are now and a good sellout... They have lost a couple of big advertisers that said, ‘I’m out. It’s too much.’ There’s a breaking point with advertisers’ budgets.”

According to Competitive Media Reports, NFL spending on the five rightsholding networks last year—ABC, NBC, Fox, ESPN and TNT—totalled...

People notice when you've got...
$1.494 billion. A 10% drop would bring the total this year down to $1.345 billion.

If Lazarus is correct, and the pool of football dollars is down this year, the timing could not be worse—all the networks agreed to huge rights increases before this season.

But analysts also say that CBS and Fox benefit from owning stations in NFL markets and from deals with affiliates to help pay NFL rights.

ABC has a national package, so its station group doesn’t help as much. And so far its affiliates aren’t helping to bear the cost. But with both ABC Monday night and ESPN Sunday night NFL packages. Disney has nearly 500 hours annually of NFL-related programming over which to amortize the cost of rights, far more than other networks.

In analyzing the CBS numbers, Geoff Jones, broadcast analyst for Donaldson Lufkin & Jenrette, says the network may well break even on its football contract if contributions from its owned stations and affiliates are factored in and if the network is able to boost rates in future years as much as it thinks it can.

WNYW plates the Yankees

WNYW(tv) has acquired the rights to air 50 over-the-air New York Yankees games per season from the team’s TV rights holder, MSG Network. The two-year deal covers the last two years (the 1999 and 2000 seasons) of MSG’s 12-year, $486 million rights agreement with the Yankees.

Speculation last week was that the local deal is part of a broader deal in progress through which MSG parent Cablevision is trying to acquire the Yankees—or possibly make a major equity investment in the team in exchange for long-term rights.

WNYW is owned by News Corp., which, with Liberty Media, has a 40% stake in Cablevision’s Rainbow sports networks. But MSG President Joe Cohen insisted at a press conference last week that the local rights deal was a “separate, stand-alone agreement.”

WNYW is paying an estimated $400,000 per game, or $20 million per season, for the Yankees rights. WNYW General Manager Michael Wach declined to confirm the exact price but said that published reports were not far off. He also insisted that the station would make a profit on the deal but declined to say how much, if at all, ad rates in the games would go up next season.

Wach said the station plans to air seven to 10 prime time games per season, with the rest airing on the weekends, in late night or in other dayparts.

While News Corp.-owned Fox has encouraged affiliates not to pick up sports rights that would preempt the network, network sources say that getting the Yankees was a unique situation, too good to pass up.

The WNYW deal marks the end of the Yankees’ 49-year relationship with WPX(TV). Word circulating in New York was that WPX would give WVCW-TV a run for the local rights to the New York Mets.

CBS to broadcast NFL in HDTV

High-def plans for NBC, ABC and Fox still fuzzy

By Glen Dickson

In a shift in its digital strategy, CBS will broadcast in HDTV four football games between November and January rather than five hours a week of movies and prime time programming.

“We decided to put our resources into football games because we think it will sell more sets,” says CBS Senior Vice President Martin D. Franks. “A sitcom in HD is not necessarily going to get people out to their favorite appliance store buying sets.”

Last spring CBS said it would broadcast five hours of HDTV programming per week starting in November—movies, sitcoms and dramas shot on 35 mm film. CBS engineers also said the network lacked the equipment to broadcast HDTV football in 1998.

But now CBS’ first official step into HDTV will be a local broadcast of the New York Jets/ Buffalo Bills NFL game on Nov. 8. It will use the 1080-interlace picture format.

The next three HDTV games: Dec. 19, New York Jets at Buffalo; Dec. 26, Kansas City Chiefs at Oakland Raiders; Jan. 9 or 10, an AFC divisional playoff game.

Only WABC-HD, CBS’s New York TV station, will broadcast the Nov. 8 game. The others will be distributed to CBS affiliates with DTV stations and to DirecTV, a satellite TV company. The satellite broadcast is for the benefit of retailers with prototype Thomson HDTV/DSS TVs.

To produce the games in HDTV, CBS will use a National Mobile Television high-definition production truck outfitted with Sony HDTV gear—cameras, VTRs, switches and effects systems.

Getting a “joint deal” with Sony to provide HDTV equipment was crucial to CBS’s NFL-in-HDTV strategy, Franks says, but he won’t disclose financial terms of the deal. “There’s something in it for us, and there’s something in it for them,” says Franks.

NBC spokesman Jeff DeMarrais says that NBC doesn’t plan to do any HDTV sports this fall but will announce its plans for long-form “special event programming” in the next couple of weeks. NBC still plans to broadcast The Tonight Show with Jay Leno in HDTV this spring.

ABC is on schedule to launch a national 720p HDTV feed on Nov. 1, says an ABC source, but hasn’t identified the programming yet. The source adds that ABC also isn’t sure of equipment availability—some of the missing pieces aren’t scheduled to be delivered until Oct. 15.

Fox is noncommittal about its HDTV schedule. But the network is on schedule to begin delivering a seven-day-a-week national prime time DTV feed on Nov. 1. The feed will be sent via fiber from the Fox Network Center in Los Angeles, says Andrew G. Setos, executive vice president of News Corp.’s News Technology Group. “It will be all the way digital from the telecine to the display with no analog links at all,” says Setos. “That feed will be up during all of prime time.”
Naturally, they want to put it all together with style.

That's why E! is introducing the first and only network devoted to the art of doing everything in style. Whether it's getting a new hairstyle or a new pair of shoes, our programming will inspire your viewers to do it all with style.

ABC affils bristle at brush-off
Board chairman calls Eisner’s comments ‘unfortunate and regrettable’

By Steve McClellan

Disney Chairman Michael Eisner has upset affiliates with public threats to put ABC-TV on cable or satellite if affiliates don’t help pay for programs and with what some see as potshots at the network.

David Barrett, COO of Hearst-Argyle Television and chairman of the ABC TV affiliate board, calls Eisner’s remarks “unfortunate and regrettable. For him to diminish his own Good Morning America program and to threaten his affiliates accomplishes nothing positive for ABC.

“Everybody’s got legitimate business concerns,” says Barrett. “I respect the sense of urgency [Eisner’s] got about the Disney company and the financial performance of ABC. I think everybody does. We want a strong network. They’re our principal program provider, and they need to be strong. But improving their financial performance at the direct expense of affiliates isn’t a good business solution.”

Alan Bell, president of Freedom Communications’ broadcast division, says that Eisner’s saber rattling “doesn’t make sense.” Many affiliates, including Freedom’s ABC stations, have long-term contracts that Bell expects the network to honor. “We need each other—and frankly, I expect that long after both Michael Eisner and I have passed from the scene our companies will be in business together.”

In a series of interviews two weeks ago, Eisner said that ABC-TV affiliates have to wake up and smell the coffee on a number of fronts, including program repurposing, station compensation and helping to pay for National Football League rights.

Eisner rarely talks to the press at length about the TV business, preferring to let ABC Inc. President Robert Iger and his subordinates handle those chores. (ABC executives did not comment last week, however.)

But Eisner is promoting a new book, “Work in Progress,” and is taking the opportunity to weigh in on critical issues facing ABC. That he has chosen to do so, analysts say, demonstrates the seriousness of the issues and Eisner’s belief that the outcome could have a significant effect on Disney’s future earnings.

On PBS’s Charlie Rose, Eisner said affiliates “will pay” for the NFL, although affiliates and the network have failed to reach a deal on an NFL rights contribution. Such deals have been struck by CBS and Fox.

ABC affiliates, Eisner said, have a right not to help pay for NFL rights under their existing affiliate contracts. “But I have a long memory. They may not pay for it for five years, but I think that is shortsighted.” He said that it is important for affiliates to stop expecting compensation and start paying for programming if ABC is to compete with companies—like USA Networks Inc.—that have dual revenue streams.

If affiliates don’t get on board, Eisner said, ABC will look at alternative distribution means, including both satellite and cable. “Our first goal would be to stay with our affiliates,” Eisner said. “We’ve been in partnership with them for 50 years.” But there are other viable distribution vehicles for the network’s programs, he said, “and we have all the software.”

Later, in a teleconference with reporters, Eisner described the traditional affiliate compensation structure as something that should go the way of “the dark ages of network television, when there were only three networks.” If affiliates try to hang on to compensation, he said, the relationship “will deteriorate and end. What will not end is the ABC Television Network. It will simply be distributed in another manner.”

Eisner also said that ABC will repurpose programming, including its soap operas, for a new cable channel, and it will multiplex the ABC Television Network within five years “as the technology and our contracts come up.”

Asked for further comment, Disney spokesman Tom Deegan said there wasn’t much else to say. “What Michael says speaks for itself,” Requests for an interview with Eisner went unanswered.

Affiliates were also angered when Eisner, in a Sept. 25 interview on Today with Katie Couric, said, “We’d love to have you come over to Good Morning America ... Matt too.”

ABC sources say they think that Eisner was simply trying to “lighten up the conversation” with Couric, who was bearing down on Eisner about the company’s problems. “It was just a joke, in his mind,” says one source.

Meanwhile, Barrett says, talks about changes in the networkaffiliate relationship continue with Pat Filiskrushed, president of ABC Television Network. “I’m encouraged by the positive way she’s trying to approach this and the recognition that any changes have to be win-win.”

ABC Radio Networks must pay $20 million to Children's Broadcasting Corp. over Radio Disney

By Elizabeth A. Rathbun

A federal jury last Wednesday awarded Children’s Broadcasting Corp. $20 million, saying that former partner ABC Radio Networks used CBC trade secrets when it created Radio Disney.

While pleased by the ruling, CBC President Christopher Dahl is bitter about what he says is a lost opportunity for a national children’s radio network he valued at $177 million. “For $20 million, they [ABC] got themselves a heck of a business,” he said.

ABC said in a news release that it asked for a mistrial because the verdict is inconsistent. While the jury said there was no “material breach” of contract, it nonetheless awarded breach-of-contract damages to CBC, ABC said.

Minneapolis-based CBC and ABC linked up in November 1995, when ABC agreed to sell ads and recruit new affiliates for CBC’s Radio AAHS children’s network. ABC quit the deal on July 30, 1996, the same day it announced that it would develop its own children’s radio network with its new parent, the Walt Disney Co.

CBC sued ABC in September 1996, alleging that ABC exploited its access to CBC’s trade secrets and improperly used proprietary information from Radio Disney. CBC said in June 1997 that it would sell its 13 AM stations.

Radio AAHS itself had folded five months earlier.

According to news reports about last week’s verdict, the nine-person U.S. District Court jury in St. Paul, Minn., deliberated for four days before agreeing that ABC had misappropriated information. The jury said ABC wrongly took CBC’s list of advertisers and breached contract requirements for national ad sales representation and confidentiality.

“We pioneered this thing through blood, sweat and tears, for six, seven years,” Dahl said. “We were proud and pleased that we did that, and we thought our arrangement with ABC would bring us to the next level. I hope this shows [Disney Chairman] Michael Eisner [that] you don’t do business this way.”

In making the defense for ABC, attorney Paul Klaas said the network tried to sell ads and find affiliates for AAHS but was hampered by a slow season, no audience rating information and AAHS affiliates’ lack of success, according to the Minneapolis Star Tribune.

Local-into-local collapses

McCain bill grinds to a halt over distant-signal dispute

By Paige Albiniai

EchoStar CEO Charlie Ergen last Thursday may have lost his last chance to offer local TV stations via satellite this year, after a disagreement between broadcasters and the satellite industry probably killed legislation that would have given Ergen the go-ahead.

“We still hope that local-into-local legislation will pass,” Ergen said after a Senate Commerce Committee hearing. “But if it doesn’t pass we’ll be back fighting for it next year.”

Negotiators seemed to be making headway last Tuesday when, after trading phone calls all weekend, broadcasters consented to giving satellite TV companies three years before they would have to carry all the local signals in any market they entered.

But broadcasters stuck firm to stipulations that neither the FCC nor Congress would make legislative or regulatory changes that would expand “white areas”—zones on the outskirts of markets where viewers can legally receive distant network signals from satellite TV carriers.

“shrinking local broadcasters’ protected market would jeopardize localism,” said Andrew Fisher, executive vice president of Cox Broadcasting.

“Fair and objective rulemaking by the FCC is key to providing a workable solution to the threat of termination of distant network signals,” said Satellite Broadcasting and Communications Association President Chuck Hewitt.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain clearly was frustrated by the interindustry bickering that forced him to pull his bill from a markup. “The lawyers and lobbyists have lawyered and lobbied the satellite and broadcast TV industries into a place that neither industry wants to be in.” McCain said. “And more lawyering and more lobbying isn’t going to get them out. It’s only going to get them in deeper.”

O&Os fighting over Oprah
Station groups angling for rights to daytime powerhouse

By Joe Schlosser

Top ABC station executives met last week with King World executives, the two sides looking to hammer out a deal to keep Oprah Winfrey’s syndicated talk show on the big ABC owned-and-operated stations.

ABC is not the only station group trying to get the most popular daytime series of the past decade. Sources say NBC, CBS and Fox executives have shown interest in acquiring Winfrey’s show, which could be available starting in fall 2000.

Last week, King World executives announced that they had renewed their contract to distribute Winfrey’s show for two more seasons (through 2002) for a minimum fee of $75 million a season. King World, which has counted on Winfrey’s show for close to 35% of its annual gross revenue, will see a significant decrease in its take during those two newly added seasons, analysts say.

King World’s current contract, also a two-year pact, is up at the end of the 1999-2000 TV season. Sources say the going rate in the top three markets is $275,000-$300,000 per week. All top 10 ABC stations are signed on to carry Winfrey’s show through the 1999-2000 season. ABC and King World executives would not comment.

“Oprah is still the top show in daytime and is as valuable or more valuable than it ever was to local stations,” says one syndication executive from a competing Hollywood studio. “Everyone is interested, but it would be shocking to see Oprah go anywhere outside the ABC stations. She has been there from the start.”

Everyone is interested in getting the rights to Oprah for 2000-02.

Executives from CBS, NBC and Fox would not comment on the possibility of acquiring the talker for their stations.

The current bidding to acquire Winfrey’s show follows tough negotiation between King World and Winfrey’s Harpo Productions over who would distribute the show after the 1999-2000 season. During those negotiations, sources say, Disney’s Buena Vista Television made a “serious” attempt to wrestle the distribution rights away from King World. Analysts say the move by Buena Vista would make a lot of sense because of the company’s relationship with the ABC Network and the O&Os. Buena Vista executives would not comment.

Sources say NBC executives also inquired about the distribution possibilities for Winfrey’s show.

Gene Autry, 1907-1998

His singing cowboy rival, the late Roy Rogers, may have been “king of the cowboys,” but Gene Autry presented a unique kind of broadcasting royalty. Autry, who died late last week just two days after his 91st birthday, was the only entertainer with five stars on the Hollywood Walk of Fame: one each for success in radio, TV, film, records and theater.

Long after he hung up his celluloid spurs for the last time, Autry continued as a star in the business world with real estate, a baseball team, film and TV production companies, and hundreds of millions of dollars in TV and radio station holdings through his Golden West Broadcasters. His sale of KTLA (TV) Los Angeles alone brought $245 million in 1985—at the time the highest price ever paid for a TV station.

Autry was named to Broadcasting & Cable’s Hall of Fame in 1993. “I was part of the development of talking pictures, the heyday of radio, the birth and incredible growth of TV,” Autry said then. “I had the best of two eras—mine and the one I re-created on the movie screen.”

In a 1948 interview with this magazine, the cowboy star—already producing his own pictures—told how a stranger came upon the young Texan singing and strumming his guitar while Autry was working in a telegraph office in Chelsea, Okla., in 1929. The stranger encouraged an impromptu performance, and later left a note advising Autry to go to New York to pursue a radio career. The note was signed “Will Rogers.”

Autry soon did take off, and by 1930 he had built an audience for a daily 15-minute broadcast on KVOO (AM) Tulsa as Oklahoma’s “Singing Cowboy.” Greater success followed: His first recording, “Silver-Haired Daddy of Mine,” sold 5 million copies. Autry would record more than 600 songs.

In 1934 he went to work for Republic Pictures, beginning a series of shorts and feature westerns that made him a major box office draw.

Autry’s radio career continued with a CBS show, Gene Autry’s Melody Ranch, that lasted from 1940 to 1956, except for his time in the military during World War II. By 1950, he was also a TV star, with 104 episodes of The Gene Autry Show between 1950 and 1956. Heroic Gene usually fought on the side of the law, aided by horse Champion and comic sidekick Pat Buttram. Always the businessman, Autry also produced several other TV shows, all with western themes. By the mid-1950s, he’d stopped performing and was concentrating on his various businesses.

A one-time minor league prospect, Autry became owner of the Los Angeles [now California] Angels in 1961 and controlled that team until 1996. He is survived by his wife, Jackie, and a sister.

CBS, NBC off to good starts

While NBC is in first, CBS is coming on strong

By Michael Stroud

Two weeks into the new season, CBS is on a hot streak that includes its first premiere week win in five years and unexpectedly strong performances last Wednesday and Thursday. But it was not enough to oust NBC from first place.

After the first 11 days of the season, NBC was in first place with a 10.4 Nielsen household rating/17 share. CBS had a 9.7/16. ABC had a 8.6/14 and Fox had a 6.6/11. Among adults 18-49, NBC was in the lead with a 6.8 rating, followed by ABC’s 5.2, Fox’s 4.5 and CBS’s 4.4.

CBS still had much to crow about. Last Wednesday’s strong showings of its new comedies, Maggie Winters and To Have and to Hold, and Thursday’s improved performance by returning Promised Land and Diagnosis Murder capped better ratings numbers for CBS on virtually every night of the week.

But when it came to market share, the best CBS could say was that household ratings fell only 3%, better than its Big Four competitors.

“What we’re seeing is the continuing erosion of broadcast television in the face of cable,” says analyst Marc Berman of Seltel.

NBC, while easily winning its core audience of 18-49-year-olds for the first 11 days, looked to be down sharply against the year-before period. Fox, which made a point of introducing new shows over the summer to avoid rerun-related ratings slippage, also was down. With its Tuesday premiers of King of the Hill and Costello both disappointments, the network was the clear loser of the first 11 days. And the networks’ market-share woes could get worse. The fall season is complicated by the first five-night-a-week schedules of UPN and The WB and the launch of Fox TV, all of which will leak more viewers away from NBC, ABC, CBS and Fox.

CBS could take comfort in its best performance since at least 1993-94. The network started with a bang on Monday night of premiere week, as returning comedy Everybody Loves Raymond upset Fox’s Ally McBeal, while the premieres of CBS’s King of Queens and L.A. Doctors took second among households—although the latter show’s ratings slipped in its second week.

The network also scored a respectable second in households on hyper-competitive Tuesday night as drama JAG outscored Fox’s Tuesday night premiere of animated comedy King of the Hill and beat the premieres of NBC’s Encore! Encore! and ABC’s The Highleys. The return of movies to CBS’s Tuesday night lineup also boosted the network’s ratings for the evening.

On Saturday night of premiere week, CBS’s debut of Martial Law outscored the debut of ABC’s Fantasy Island, pacing the network to a win for the evening.

A strong lead-in from Sunday football bolstered CBS’s traditional Sunday night dominance for the week, as its movie, ”Forever Love,” 60 Minutes and Touch by an Angel paced the network’s win.

CBS is hardly home free for the season. It placed third in its target demographic of adults 25-54 during the first 10 days and was a disappointing fourth among advertiser-coveted 18-49-year-olds. This despite the Sunday NFL telecast, which the network is using as a platform to promote its weekday prime time lineup.

For the first 10 days, CBS scored a 9.8 rating/16 share among households, down 3% from the same period last year. NBC was second with a 9.6/16. ABC scored an 8.9/15 and Fox had a 6.4/10.

NBC easily maintained its dominance among 18-49-year-olds; Thursday night’s ER, Friends, Frasier, Jesse and Veronica’s Closet were some of the first 11 days’ top-ranked shows. That helped offset the sting of the network’s decline in household and overall ratings for the first 11 days.

In an interview toward the end of the first week, NBC Entertainment President Warren Littlefield said his network is right on track with its ratings projections last May to advertisers, who committed $2.2 billion to NBC’s 1998-99 season. “It looks like we have delivered exactly what we predicted,” he said. Some of NBC’s ratings decline was unavoidable, Littlefield noted, since the network was competing against last season’s famous live ER opener, which garnered some of NBC’s highest ratings ever. Last year’s premiere week also got a boost from the first week’s episode of Mad About You, when Helen Hunt’s character gave birth. For all the talk of post-Seinfeld malaise, NBC convincingly won its new Thursday nights with its old “must-see”

Felicity Premiere for The WB

Felicity lived up to the hype last week: its premiere episode chalked up The WB’s highest first-night rating.

The drama about a girl’s college adventures attracted a 4.8 Nielsen rating/8 share, outranking the January premiere of The WB’s hit Dawson’s Creek in households, adults 18-49, viewers 12-34 and women 18-34.

The show’s performance puts The WB on track to recoup its losses in fiscal 1999 by about $25 million to $55 million, according to the network’s internal estimates. The show is now commanding more than $200,000 for a 30-second slot in spot ad rights, on par with Dawson’s Creek numbers and nearly three times what it sold for during the upfront advertising market last May.

ABC also had reason for some satisfaction after its first 11 days’ performance, as its multibillion dollar bet on football paid off with a dominating performance on premiere Monday. Home Improvement’s performance on Tuesday was bolstered by an unexpectedly strong showing from its new comedy, The Hughleys, at 8:30, which smashed the premiere of Fox’s Costello and NBC’s new comedy, Encore! Encore! The performance helped offset a disappointing performance over premiere weekend: the debut of Fantasy Island was outgunned by Martial Law on Saturday.

Oprah’s loss may be Roseanne’s gain

By Dan Trigoboff

For former White House intern Monica Lewinsky, it was a week of potential fortune lost and then regained.

First, in an interview with TV Guide, Oprah Winfrey said she’d turned down the first interview with the President’s one-time favorite guest in a dispute over money. But by midweek Roseanne told Larry King she would pay big for Monica.

Lewinsky’s publicist, Judy Smith, would not comment on either show’s interest.

After what she thought was an agreement, Winfrey said, “they came back with all these other ideas about rights and international, and that’s when I just said forget it. I said from the very beginning that I was not going to pay... and my feeling was giving up the rights was just someone else paying the check... it depends on what your definition of money is.”

Roseanne, however, said on Larry King Live that she’d pay “big” — “seven figures times two or three.” Asked by King if she felt “journalistically impaired” by offering to pay for an interview, Roseanne said, “Well, I don’t feel I’m a journalist. So there’s a difference. I can understand why journalists have that integrity thing but, fortunately for me, I have no integrity.”

WASHINGTON

Making time for Charlie

The Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) was so tight for time last Thursday that he canceled a speech he was supposed to make at a conference of Washington lawyers. But apparently he wasn’t too busy for EchoStar CEO Charlie Ergen, who interviewed McCain Thursday afternoon for his Charlie Chat series, segments of which appear on EchoStar’s Dish Network.

McCain talked to Ergen about his satellite TV bill, which appeared to be laid to rest last week after broadcasters and the satellite industry failed to come to a compromise. “We all know that the majority of Americans and satellite subscribers want to watch their local news, weather and sports — it’s important,” McCain told Ergen. “And (EchoStar) should be able to provide that service.” The segment is scheduled to air today (Oct. 5) at 8 p.m. ET.

Interference calls

The National Association of Broadcasters radio board members Tuesday will hash out, via conference call, the group’s stance on an FCC proposal to let stations negotiate interference agreements.

“The NAB has traditionally opposed any move that would create interference between stations, but we want to make sure that license applicants have reasonable flexibility,” says Barry Umansky, NAB general counsel. In June, the FCC proposed to allow stations to strike interference deals on two conditions: total service gains exceed service losses by 5 to 1 and no station loses more than 5% of its service area and population.

The proposal also would permit so-called contingent applications, which require a second station to make a signal change before taking effect. Comments on the plan are due Oct. 20.

DENVER

Bye, bye TCI

One ripple effect of TCI’s impending merger with AT&T is that TCI’s name will eventually fade into the history books. From a business perspective, the disappearance of TCI’s name is simply a footnote to one of the biggest telecommunications mergers in history. It’s a different matter for consumers, however. TCI reports receiving lots of calls from customers when the deal was announced in late June. No word yet on what name AT&T will pick to market the cable business that will be part of the new AT&T Consumer Services Co. It’s a good bet it will stay away from a ponderous moniker such as AT&T Consumer Service Co. Cable. Maybe Ma Cable?

NEW YORK

IPO on track

It appears to be full speed ahead for the Fox initial public offering of stock, despite stock market volatility and the third quarter’s dismal showing for IPOs. News Corp. officials plan to begin meeting with Wall Street analysts today (Oct. 5) to fill them in on details of what reportedly will be a $100 million offering of Fox shares. After making the pitch to Wall Street, News Corp. executives will head out on a three-week road show to pitch the offering. Stock market slump notwithstanding, money managers have been generally upbeat about the IPO, figuring it’s a clear way to value News Corp.’s U.S. broadcast assets that could translate into a boost for News Corp. shares, depending on how the IPO is priced. Early signs are that the Fox shares will be priced at $20 or so and will hit the market in late October or early November.

PrimeTime 24 takes EchoStar to court over breach of contract

By Paige Albinia

Satellite TV distributor PrimeTime 24 late last month sued EchoStar Communications Corp. for breach of contract.

PrimeTime 24 filed its lawsuit after EchoStar in July canceled its contract with the company to provide imported affiliate signals to EchoStar customers who live in “white areas,” which are places where subscribers cannot clearly receive over-the-air television using a rooftop antenna.

EchoStar decided to stop using PrimeTime 24 as its distant-signal provider when a federal district court in Miami ruled that PrimeTime 24 had to cut off network feeds of subscribers who do not live in white areas. EchoStar is using its own distant-signal services, called DishNet West and DishNet East, to provide imported affiliates to customers.

“We clearly expect to win this lawsuit because we believe that we have every right to drop PrimeTime 24,” says EchoStar CEO Charlie Ergen. “Two different courts have shown them to be violating the law. We chose to file the lawsuit and we realize that we face some exposure for doing that.”

PrimeTime 24 had no comment on the lawsuit.

According to PrimeTime 24, EchoStar owes the company $2.1 million for skipped payments and interest on late payments. PrimeTime 24 wants EchoStar to pay it damages as well as the missed payments and interest. It also wants the court to issue injunctions against EchoStar, forcing it to resume use of PrimeTime 24’s service as required by its contract.

PrimeTime 24 hasn’t had much luck in court lately. Besides losing the Miami case, a federal district judge in New York last week threw out a suit PrimeTime 24 filed against broadcasters for supposedly working together to prevent PrimeTime 24 from using its copyright to sell distant network signals. In 1997, broadcasters filed separate suits in three different cities charging PrimeTime 24 with violating copyright law.

In one of those cases, a judge in Raleigh, N.C., in August revoked PrimeTime 24’s entire copyright license, citing flagrant disregard for the law.

Meanwhile, PrimeTime 24’s lawsuit against EchoStar kept Ergen from testifying last Thursday at a hearing on satellite TV legislation held by the Senate Commerce Committee.

“Your hearing and this legislation are far too important to the satellite industry and to competition to have a side issue detract from the central goals of bringing choice and lower prices to the American people,” Ergen wrote in a letter to Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.).

FCC exerts itself for dish owners

Agency preempts local jurisdictions over home antenna regulation

By Bill McConnell

Users of satellite dishes have won some new protections from meddlesome local governments and neighborhood associations.

The FCC ruled on Sept. 25 that home and condominium owners may not be prohibited from setting up dishes and wireless cable antennas as long as the devices are placed on balconies, decks or other areas where the owner has “exclusive use” of the property.

The agency’s order is the first of two initiatives the FCC has undertaken to spell out when it will preempt local and landlord objections to dish installation. Within the next three weeks the FCC is expect to issue additional rules for apartment dwellings and rental housing.

Consumer advocates and lawyers for property owners praise the FCC action, which they say also indicates how the agency will come down on rules for rental tenants.

“The tone of the new decision points toward a concern that all viewers be permitted access to their choice of service,” says Andrew Schwartzman, director of the Media Access Project.

“People who live in apartments are among the most dependent on television for entertainment and information and have the greatest need for diverse options.”

Still, the FCC appears likely to strike a balance that gives building owners the right to prevent roofs and shared spaces in their buildings from being strewn with antennas and dishes. “We don’t have a problem with dishes being installed on premises where tenants have exclusive use,” says Nicholas Miller, an attorney for a coalition of landlords and building managers. “We have a problem with what they do with common spaces and the outside of buildings.”

The new order revises rules issued in August 1996 that prevent third parties from blocking dish installations, except for safety and historic preservation reasons. Those rules, however, left unclear the rights of people living in rental housing and of condo residents and neighborhoods with strict community regulations. A variety of groups—including satellite and wireless communications firms, trade associations for building and property owners and consumer groups—had asked for several changes to the law.

Communications industry groups called the FCC ruling a “mixed bag” that ensures homeowners access to the television service of their choice but leaves the door open for third-party interference. “We are disappointed that the FCC declined to claim sole authority for regulation of dishes,” says Michael Petricone, director of technol-

FCC drops EEO filing requirement

The FCC last week gave broadcasters a break from some of their paperwork by suspending employment reporting requirements. The FCC said it could not justify the filing rules after a federal court upheld its decision to strike down the agency’s minority recruitment rules. FCC Chairman William Kennard pledged to design new rules that will pass muster with the court. “I expect we will issue a proposal before the end of the year,” he said.

In the meantime, however, Kennard hopes using a little moral persuasion will keep the paper flowing anyway: “I strongly encourage broadcasters to continue filing equal employment opportunity data so that interested parties can monitor industry trends during the short filing hiatus.”

Commissioner Harold Furchtgott-Roth agreed that the reporting requirements should be suspended but said the commission should not promise to revamp its employment rules. “There are many hurdles to overcome before the commission can officially promulgate new rules, not the least of which is the question [of] whether we possess statutory authority to regulate employment practices.”

NAB opposes EchoStar distant-signal plan

EchoStar is trying to “decimate” the operations of TV stations by asking for FCC permission to transmit distant network signals into more local markets, broadcasters complained late last month.

EchoStar’s proposal would deny local broadcasters exclusive rights to their most lucrative programming and “would have a catastrophic effect on free, over-the-air broadcasting,” said the National Association of Broadcasters in a letter to the FCC. “The demise of free, over-the-air local television service would result in fewer, not more, programming choices—a result particularly harmful for those who cannot afford to pay for television service,” added the Network Affiliated Stations Alliance.

Satellite industry groups, however, said present FCC standards deny too many customers access to network programming. “Congress did not intend to adopt a measurement that effectively prohibits a significant number of households from receiving satellite signals even though they are unable to receive an adequate over-the-air signal,” wrote the Satellite Broadcasting & Communications Association. The FCC currently allows satellite companies to transmit programming from distant stations to households that receive clear local signals only half the time. EchoStar wants permission to offer network signals when a household gets clear local signals less than 90% of the time.

FCC and pirate rendezvous in Memphis

Elvis may be alive and well somewhere in Memphis, but a pirate radio station that has been broadcasting in the bluff city has definitely bitten the dust. The FCC last week seized the transmission equipment of “Free Radio Memphis,” an illegal station that has been broadcasting on 94.7 mhz. After repeated warnings to cease operations, the FCC shut down the station, with a little help from U.S. marshals, on Sept. 23.

Beaty moves at FCC

Cable customers will have to take their rate complaints to someone else. Elizabeth Beaty, chief of the FCC’s financial analysis and compliance division, last week announced that she is joining the agency’s congressional relations team.

Correction

Due to an editing error, Broadcasting & Cable incorrectly reported in the Sept. 28 issue that members are pushing to move legislation on satellite TV being floated by Rep. Billy Tauzin (R-La.) to the floor. House Commerce Committee Chairman Tom Billey (R-Va.) and 22 other members Sept. 25 sent a letter to House leadership asking them to move to the floor for a vote a different Tauzin-sponsored bill that would stay the royalty fees that satellite TV companies pay. Tauzin’s bill, in its current form, also would allow satellite TV companies to offer local signals if they carried all the signals in a market.

FCC's Kennard finds boosting number of minority-owned stations is uphill struggle

By Bill McConnell

FCC Chairman William Kennard’s effort to increase the number of radio and TV stations owned by minorities is being slowed by hostile courts and lawmakers and indifferent broadcasters.

"You would think in this era of unprecedented growth and prosperity in the industry we would see more growth and prosperity among minority stations." will answer the call is unclear.

Even though the number of Hispanic-owned stations has grown by 20 (to 140) during the past four years, minority ownership overall has been frozen at 3%.

The numbers for African-American owners are particularly bleak, with the total number of black-owned outlets declining from 213 in 1994 to 190 today. Outlets owned by Asian-American owners, as well.

WHERE TO FIND MINORITY STATIONS

Kennard said last month at a luncheon hosted by the National Association of Black-Owned Broadcasters, “But we’re seeing fewer people who own broadcast stations, and we’re not seeing new faces and new voices coming on the scene.”

Kennard, the first African American to head the agency, came into office last year determined to revive federal programs designed to bring minorities into the business. But the courts and Congress in the past three years have steadfastly opposed preferential treatment for racial groups. Stepping up the pressure this summer, Kennard called for voluntary initiatives, but how many in the industry

Kennard: "You would think in this era of unprecedented growth and prosperity...we would see more growth and prosperity among minority stations."

ics have remained at five.

In the past year alone, the total number of minority owners dropped by 23. Even for Hispanics, the number of operators fell by eight.

"The same trend of consolidation in the industry at large is playing itself out among minority owners," says Larry Irving, who heads the Commerce Department’s National Telecommunications and Information Administration. “Another distressing statistic is that 17 states have no minority owners of any commercial broadcast outlets. For instance, you can go north of San Francisco and until you run into an Eskimo in Canada, you are not going to find anybody of color who owns a station."

Ensuring minority ownership means more than just making sure nonwhites get a shot at the economic brass ring, Kennard says. Without diversity in telecommunications, America’s growing minority populations will be denied the most important vehicles for political communication and cultural influence. “With the growth of digital technology and the Internet, we truly are seeing a revolution in the industry, but if we can’t make it work for all Americans it will be a failed revolution.”

The squeeze on minority owners is occurring on two fronts. First, the consolidation wave is pricing out one- and two-station owners, a group to which most minority owners belong. Second, virtually all of the FCC’s minority ownership programs have been eliminated.

The latest round of industry consolidation was ushered in with passage of the Telecommunications Act of 1996, which eliminated the national ownership cap for radio stations and relaxed local ownership limits as well. National limits on television ownership also were eased.

The deregulatory bonanza sparked a buying spree that has pushed station prices to stratospheric heights. With 200-station groups now the norm among the top radio groups, ever-larger conglomerates are using economies of scale to boost their profits.

whose family owns KPR1(AM)-KPRS(AM) Kansas City, Mo., says that high prices have stifled his efforts to add more stations: “Even when banks are willing to lend at these prices, we would have to put one of the stations we already own on the line to get financing. That’s a difficult decision to make when you’re talking about families that own one or two stations—and 90% of black owners are in that position.”

With large competitors controlling as many as eight stations in a market, minority owners say they are losing a greater share of ad revenue and popular syndicated programming as well.

Any number of FCC minority programs have fallen on hard times. Congress eliminated one of the most popular initiatives, the minority tax certificate, which allowed broadcasters or cable companies to defer capital gains taxes after selling a property to a minority. The certificates, first permitted for sales to minorities in 1978, helped them acquire 288 radio stations, 43 TV stations and 31 cable companies. But lawmakers argued that the tax breaks were susceptible to abuse, allowing some minority buyers to sell out after owning the stations for only a year. In 1995, Congress was outraged when Viacom announced that it would defer more than $800 million in taxes by selling its cable systems to a minority investor group, and lawmakers axed the program.

Losing the tax certificate was a crippling blow, given that two years earlier a court had thrown out a policy that gave minorities a leg up in the comparative hearings that regulators used to assign new licenses. That policy allowed 23 of 100 new radio permits issued between 1987 and 1991 to go to minorities, says David Honig, executive director of the Minority Media Telecommunications Council.

That policy allowed 23 of 100 new radio permits issued between 1987 and 1991 to go to minorities, says David Honig, executive director of the Minority Media Telecommunications Council.

‘The era of shams’

It’s no wonder Congress takes a dim view of the FCC’s minority preference programs, which virtually have been eliminated by lawmakers and court rulings.

One of the most popular programs, which allowed broadcast companies to defer taxes by selling to minorities, was frequently abused in spirit. Companies looking to cash in could strike a deal with minority buyers, who would hold on to a station for a year or two before selling.

Congress finally had enough in 1995, when the former White House official who created the tax program decided to turn a tidy profit from his own invention. Frank Washington, an African American who designed the tax certificate while working for the White House Office of Telecommunications Policy, signed a deal to buy Viacom’s cable system and create the largest-ever tax certificate.

Washington became general partner and 21% owner of a company backed by Intermedia Partners and Tele-Communications Inc. Those two companies put up most of the money, while Washington contributed only $1 million. Viacom was to receive the $2.3 billion price and defer $600 million in federal and state taxes, but Congress retroactively killed the company’s tax break when it eliminated the program.

If Congress agrees to revive the tax certificate, FCC Chairman William Kennard says the FCC will design safeguards against future abuses: “There were some problems with it, but we shouldn’t forget about it.

“We’re not going to do anything that simply creates the illusion of progress,” he adds. “We have lived through the era of shams. Now it’s time to get real ownership and control.”

—Bill McConnell

Also in 1995, a Supreme Court ruling in the Adarand Contractors case made it much more difficult for the government to give preferential treatment to minority businesses. The decision eliminated a program that allowed broadcasters threatened with a license revocation to sell a station to a minority for 75% of its market value rather than undergo an FCC hearing. From 1978 to 1990, these so-called distress sales turned 18 broadcast stations over to minority owners.

Also, the U.S. Court of Appeals in April threw out the FCC’s minority recruiting rules in a suit the agency brought against the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod. Last month court refused to reconsider the decision. The ruling, which the FCC may appeal to the Supreme Court, was a blow not only to the agency but also called into question the legality of all federal minority preference programs.

Relaxing the national ownership restrictions in 1996 removed another incentive for large broadcasters to partner with minority firms. Until then companies constrained by the caps could hold stakes in up to two additional TV stations and three more radio outlets if those stations were controlled by minorities.

Kennard’s new push

Despite the grim prognosis, Kennard is determined to revamp the FCC’s minority programs. In August the commission approved bidding credits that new entrants to the industry can use in auctions for commercial analog broadcast licenses. Minorities are among the intended beneficiaries. Kennard also has called on the industry to develop ideas for boosting minority ownership.

Last month he also announced plans to commission a series of studies to determine whether lack of access to capital, meager advancement opportunities and discrimination by media brokers are blocking minorities, women, and small businesses from entering the business. The commission also is surveying the industry to determine whether there is widespread bias against advertising on African American-oriented stations. That survey was instigated by this summer’s disclosure of a Katz Radio Group memo urging advertisers to avoid black audiences.

enthusiastic endorsements from the commission’s other two Democratic appointees, Susan Ness and Gloria Tristani. Michael Powell, an African American, also is sympathetic, but warns that FCC efforts to revive minority ownership programs could quickly run aground if the agency doesn’t get Congress and the courts on board.

“IT would be very sad if 10 years from now we had spent all our energy pursuing these kinds of head-on policies and got turned back consistently and ended up helping no one,” Powell told the black broadcasters’ meeting two weeks ago. “We need to look for policies we think candidly and honestly will be able to sustain some level of judicial review,” he added. “We also have to be politically savvy—most of the initiatives we can put on the table will require a legislative component.”

Reviving the tax certificate will require legislation, but getting congressional support won’t be easy. Key Republicans—such as Rep. Billy Tauzin (R-La.), chairman of House Commerce’s telecommunications subcommittee—are wary, if not downright hostile, to minority preferences. “Obviously, Billy encourages minority ownership, but we shouldn’t be setting quotas or dictating who owns radio and TV stations,” says an aide to the Louisiana lawmaker.

Democrats, on the other hand, are likely to oppose industry proposals that call for lifting ownership limits in return for investments in minority firms. “We’re supportive of Kennard’s attempts to create a dialog, but diversity should not come at the expense of greater ownership and control for large broadcasters,” says a staffer for Rep. Ed Markey (Mass.), the subcommittee’s ranking Democrat.

But Commissioner Harold Furchtgott-Roth even questions whether promoting minority ownership falls under the FCC’s purview: “There is considerable case law indicating that such an interest is not cognizable under the ‘public interest’ standard,” he said in a written statement last week.

The notion that minority ownership should be measured at all borders on racism, he added. Pursuing ethnic ownership goals as a way of ensuring programming diversity places the commission “in the difficult—if not distasteful—position of proving that the color of a person’s skin or the composition of an individual’s chromosomes determines personal interests and beliefs,” he said.

Kennard, for his part, acknowledges that the FCC faces a difficult task in getting broad-based support for minority initiatives, but insists that the situation isn’t hopeless: “It’s a hard problem, but to do anything is unacceptable. The Supreme Court did not shut the door on the government’s ability to assist minorities. We just have to make a more compelling showing for why [minority initiatives] are necessary—we are going to do that.”

So far, however, many minority broadcasters are skeptical that the FCC can do more than jawbone the media conglomerates. “It looks like the current mindset is to exclude minorities,” says Esther Renteria, co-chairperson of the National Hispanic Media Coalition. “The FCC has a problem, and I don’t know how they can go around it.”

Don Cornwell, chairman of Granite Broadcasting, one of the largest minority-owned TV companies, says that the FCC should do more on its own. He complains that the FCC rejected his request to waive the agency’s duopoly restrictions and allow Granite to own two San Francisco TV stations. “When given the chance to help minorities they ought to take that chance,” he says, complaining about his case. “Neither one of the San Francisco stations is truly competitive on its own, but if we put them together they would grab 6% of the revenue in the market and they would give us the ability to start the first black-owned news service in the country.”

Help from the haves
But Kennard rejects any notion that the FCC’s effort is a flop. For starters, he insists that his herculean of the industry is paying off.

In July, he notes, both Fox Television and Paxson Communications floated minority assistance plans. Fox Television has offered to launch an investment fund of some $150 million for minority broadcast companies in return for an increase in the national ownership limits. For the same quid pro quo, Paxson has offered to take minority ownership stakes in minority firms. Three weeks ago Paxson made good on its offer by announcing plans to sell an Iowa TV station and construction permits for four others to a minority firm. Paxson plans to hold a 49% stake in the minority company if the FCC will agree not to count the five stations toward Paxson’s national audience limit.

Other big media firms also are going ahead with plans to create investment funds. In June, Chancellor Media, Capstar Broadcasting and LIN Television said they were teaming with TSG Capital Group to search out minority investment opportunities. To help prepare minorities for the eventual goal of ownership, the Broadcast Executive Directors Association said in August that it will start a senior management training program. NBC is planning to expand its minority internship and college scholarship program, which often leads to full-time jobs after graduation. CBS and Capstar are working with the Minority Media Telecommunications Council to find minority buyers for stations they want to spin off.

But the industry overtures, particularly those from Fox and Paxson, have received a mixed reaction from the FCC and the minority community. "It's counterintuitive to say we should allow more concentration in order to promote diversity," Commissioner Tristan told the Association of Women in Radio and Television last month.

Ness too has reservations: "For anyone to conclude that they can give x amount of dollars in return for a waiver concerns me greatly."

Renteria complains that Paxson's requirement that partners affiliate with its network would force minorities to surrender a critical component of ownership—choosing programming content. And, echoing complaints by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, she says that the Fox proposal would provide too little cash to make a difference. "That kind of money does not match today's prices. One station in Los Angeles and another top market can go for many millions of dollars."

Granite's Cornwell is split on the two most prominent industry proposals, giving the thumbs up to the Fox idea but arguing that with a 49% stake Paxson will hardly be a hands-off investor.

Honig, however, says it's too early to pass judgment on the industry's response. "It's not important how many people make an ambiguous statement of commitment, but rather [it's important] what happens to minorities and women in the industry. Ask me in December."

Kennard has not endorsed any plans but says he is encouraged by the industry's efforts: "I think some very interesting proposals have been put on the table."

As for complaints that minority owners may be obligated to affiliate with Paxson or other investors' networks, he says: so what? "I don't think programming requirements alone are enough to say there is no minority control, otherwise no network affiliate in the country could say it was truly independent."

But Kennard says he will oppose plans that repeat abuses of the past, such as requiring minority owners to give their big media investors an option to buy their stations before trying to sell them on the open market. Minority owners also should be prohibited from "flipping" their stations; they should be required to hold on to them for five years. "We don't want to create a class of owners who aren't really owners," he says. "And it's legitimate to insist that they stay in the business or roll their investment into other media properties."

For his part, Paxson Chairman Lowell "Bud" Paxson predicts the commission will shoot down his plan. "I won't get it, even though they've asked the industry to step up. They should have the guts to let us get capital and experience into these companies and help them succeed."

Beef up BROADCAP?

Industry players also are trying to restructure another popular private sector investment. John Oxendine, a former owner of minority-run Blackstar, is trying to create an investment fund modeled on BROADCAP, which was designed by the National Association of Broadcasters to help minority owners. Unlike BROADCAP, which was funded by tax-deductible donations, Oxendine wants his new fund to provide a lucrative return for investors and generate the billions of dollars in capital necessary to build national broadcast groups rather than buy stations one at a time. "BROADCAP helped roughly 35 minority-owned companies access $80 million, but we have to provide a systematic way for minorities to get capital," he says. "We need to be buying two or three stations at a time, not just setting up a few mom-and-pop shops."

Kennard insists that government can step in too, most effectively with a revamped tax certificate. "This was the single most important tool we ever had in government to assist minorities getting into the business, and there's still a lot of sentiment for bringing it back. Working with Congress, he hopes to create a program that will pass muster—perhaps by targeting it to small companies, which would at least give minorities a fair shot at finding investors.

Given the higher cost of buying traditional broadcast stations, Larry Irving says minorities also should look to alternative technologies, such as Internet broadcasting and low-power television, as avenues for getting into the media business. "We have to look to the future. There is more diversification in these markets already, and the barriers to entry are lower. I know of a 15-year-old with an Internet station who's making money."

"It's very hard for minorities to get capital and training necessary to run an eight-station group," he says. "With the sorry state of minority ownership in this country, we have to consider all the alternatives."

Ness says the industry should consider making sponsorship of minority training programs a condition for lifting ownership limits. "The large company should take a leadership role in training minorities and women to be station managers and general managers and moving them up the ranks. You can't be a successful owner if you don't have proper training."

Minority groups themselves also need to do more, Irving insists. Better grass-roots efforts will be needed to revive the tax certificate and other government programs. "The tax certificate was not an issue that got the minority community excited when Congress was moving to end it, but it did get opponents of affirmative action excited. Today we need to be vigilant to make sure grass-roots organizations use their power on telecommunications issues."

He also wants minorities themselves to create their own investment pools. "We may need to aggregate capital ourselves, but so far we haven't had a culture to do that."

But Granite Broadcasting's Don Cornwall says that he's still waiting for the offensive to begin. "They're giving speeches about minority ownership, but not much is happening. If I were Bill Kennard, I wouldn't want that to be my legacy."

First-run Fantasy/Sci-fi Scoring with unreality

Fantasy and sci-fi programs face formidable challenges in today's syndication marketplace: time periods are harder to come by with blockbuster off-networks show like The X-Files competing for viewers. But shows about the unreal have real staying power.

By Barbara Osborn, B&C correspondent

One-hour fantasy and sci-fi hours may be as numerous as Hercules' adventures this season, but they are not invincible. Hollywood studios often spend more than $1 million per episode on these series, which face fewer available time periods and increasing competition from off-network hours like The X-Files and Walker, Texas Ranger. Without revenue from international distribution, these shows might not be seen domestically.

Of the 23 new and returning hours in syndication this season, 16 are either science fiction or fantasy/adventure. There are 11 returning series: Xena: Hercules; Star Trek: Deep Space 9; The X-Files; and The New Adventures of Robin Hood.

Spin-offs are common for the fantasy and sci-fi genres: Xena followed Hercules, both from Studios USA.

Space 9: PSI Factor; Gene Roddenberry's Earth: Final Conflict; NightMan; Outer Limits: Pollgerist; The Legacy; Conan: The Adventurer; Viper; and Honey, I Shrink the Kids, entering its second season in syndication this fall, is based on the hit feature film, and Highlander: The Raven evolved from Highlander. This season, Studios USA will try to open up a new daypart for its Hercules franchise with its half-hour Young Hercules spin-off on Fox Kids Network.

But industry observers express skepticism about the viability of the new hours, regardless of genre. Katz vice president and director of programming, Ruth Lee Leaycraft, says that given the poor time periods allocated for new, untested series and the competition from fall sports: "It's a real tough environment for weekend programming. Ultimately, it's a question of quality of clearances as the shows bounce around the sports schedule. They have a chance if viewers can find them and they can get through the fourth quarter. To get to the second season is quite a milestone," she continues, "but a series' fate is decided in that second season."

Among the new sci-fi and fantasy series, Leaycraft says The Crow: Stairway to Heaven (cleared in 96% of the country) has several things in its favor. "It's the spin-off of a movie," she says. "It's also PolyGram's first entry in syndication, and their intention is to set a high standard for themselves, because they want to be taken seriously. You'll see high quality from them."

Among other first-season, first-run series, Leaycraft singles out Air America precisely because it isn't Hercules or Xena. "We're maxing out," she says. "Viewers get bored, and they look for a fantasy hour with ratings that can challenge those of off-network series."
something different. You need to find that fine line between satisfying an appetite and opening new creative doors.”

As for returning series, Leary calls Western International’s Conan: The Adventurer “a work in progress.” But she has hope for the series: “Any series takes a while to find a groove. If you compare Hercules year one and Hercules year two, there was tremendous growth in that show. Stations need programming, and they have seen the success of Xena and Hercules and are hoping lightning will strike again.”

At Blair Television, vice president and director of programming Garnett Losak singles out first-season spin-off Highlander: The Raven and MGM’s Stargate as promising, since both have track records.

Of returning series, Losak says Tribune’s Earth: Final Conflict can be expected to perform well, since it was the strongest first-run performer last season and is carried by stations owned by Tribune. (Earth: Final Conflict is cleared in 98% of the country.)

Losak says that while achieving success in this marketplace is difficult, sci-fi and fantasy shows outperform others. “We looked at this a few years ago and found the sci-fi genre in general had a tendency to perform better than other kinds of shows,” she says. “But I wasn’t convinced that it wasn’t simply that Star Trek dominated the genre so much.”

Does Losak’s suspicion explain why sci-fi and fantasy series have gone through the ratings roof in recent years? There are many theories.

For starters, the sci-fi/fantasy category appeals to a desirable, male-skewing 25-54 audience. The male appeal, in fact, is so strong that it has kept PSI Factor, now in its third season with lackluster ratings, on the air.

Atlantic Films President Peter Sussman notes that while PSI Factor has been drawing ratings of 2.1 in late-night time slots, “The 18-49 male audience is comparable to what Baywatch gets, and the series is produced for much less than its competitors.”

But sci-fi and fantasy/adventure series have more than strong appeal, they have broad appeal, says MGM Worldwide TV President John Symes, who has staked the company’s business on the genre. “People underestimate the attraction it has for women 18-49 and 25-54,” he says.

“People thought Outer Limits was a male vehicle, but the female demos are almost as good—and in some cases as good as Rysher’s ‘Highlander: The Raven’ is considered a relatively expensive syndicated series at $1.2 million-$1.3 million per episode.

“...So what does a producer of sci-fi and fantasy series think about the future of the genre?”

At the recent Showtime event, vice president and general manager John Bainton says, “I still think sci-fi and fantasy shows have a very bright future, and we are looking at the next generation of shows.”

For one thing, the genre is not just about science fiction and fantasy, it’s about good storytelling. “The science fiction and fantasy shows have more than strong appeal, they have broad appeal,” says MGM Worldwide TV President John Symes, who has staked the company’s business on the genre. “People underestimate the attraction it has for women 18-49 and 25-54,” he says.

“People thought Outer Limits was a male vehicle, but the female demos are almost as good—and in some cases as good as the male demos. With a [Showtime-to-syndication] output deal like ours, sci-fi is probably the best avenue to take.”

Matt Lore, executive vice president of North American production for Pearson Television, contends that Saturday/Sunday non-appointment viewers are drawn to these series because of their clear, simple concepts. “These concepts grab you immediately, and you get attached to them,” he says. “They’re pretty simple. It’s not like turning on NYPD Blue. You turn on Xena, and it takes about 30 seconds to figure out who the characters are. The Outer Limits is a new story each week, so you don’t have a problem knowing who the characters are.”

Part of the sci-fi/fantasy “look” reflects technological advances, suggests Peter Sussman. “Because of the MTV influence, TV has become more of a visual experience. Attention spans are shorter. Today, we can tell the stories that couldn’t be told because of prohibitive technological requirements and costs.”

Rep firm Katz’s vice president and director of programming, Bill Carroll, argues that more subtle characteristics also contribute to the category’s success. A sly, tongue-in-cheek humor has been a hallmark of these series since the 1960s Star Trek, he says. “Seven out of 10 Star Trek episodes were deadly serious. But there were two or three in which they would bring in a bigger-than-life character, and it was played, if not for laughs, for folly,” Carroll says.

Sci-fi and fantasy programming can be economical, particularly compared with network series. Chuck Larsen, head of consulting firm October Moon Television and former head of world-wide distribution at MTM, contends that companies produce sci-fi and fantasy programs because they’re affordable. Even a relatively expensive syndicated series—such as Highlander: The Raven, budgeted at $1.2 million–$1.3 million per episode—runs half a million dollars shy of the average network drama.

Nor does it hurt that the sci-fi/fantasy category has enormous international appeal. Because the series are set in another world—as opposed to New York, Chicago or Los Angeles—they translate internationally.

Sussman of Atlantis Films says that if science-fiction stories are told well, they can succeed almost everywhere. “Sometimes fantasy runs afoul in Asia,” he says. “It conflicts with some of their religious or moral values. And sometimes you run into problems with France,” where, Sussman says, the culture “has not shown the same level of affection” for the sci-fi genre as in other parts of the world.

But even the French, it seems, can be won over. Anat Birnbaum, director of foreign fiction acquisition for Canal Plus, reports that Earth: Final Conflict—in a less-than-ideal time slot and up against the World Cup—performed well for the French pay cable service.

Given the size of sci-fi and fantasy budgets, foreign appeal and foreign partnerships are essential. International revenue often covers 50%-70% of the production budget. Tribune President Dick Askin says that Tribune won’t go into production without overseas partners in place.

Tribune partners with Atlantis on Gene Roddenberry’s Earth: Final Conflict and with Atlantis and Village Roadshow on NightMan. On the company’s 1999 season series, The Exorcist, they have partnered with Morgan Creek and a possible foreign partner.

THE POWER OF A LEGACY.
First-run Fantasy/Sci-fi

First-run Fantasy/Sci-fi is so important to the success of sci-fi/fantasy programs that the U.S. can almost be considered the aftermarket. In fact, for First Wave, the new Pearson Television series, the U.S. is an aftermarket. Executive vice president Matt Loze calls First Wave "an interesting, backwards deal."

Pearson initially tried to launch the series in first-run but couldn't build enough station support. Ultimately, the company found production financing in Canada and Europe. The series launched in Canada on Citytv's Space Channel on Sept. 9.

Loze underscores that the company plans to discuss the series with syndicators, pay cable, and—since they have 22 episodes to show—the networks as well.

Loze concedes that he's not sure whether Pearson's unorthodox production process will prove "a great accident. At the end of the day, we may find ourselves trying to appeal to too many audiences and get watered down."

Among movies that are candidates for spin-offs, few have seemed more promising than "Total Recall," the 1990 $350 million blockbuster.

In a deal that would have raised eyebrows a few years ago, Total Recall 2070 will debut on Showtime the first week of November, but next season PolyGram will syndicate 22 episodes. Total Recall 2070 will be the company's "marquee property" at NATPE '99; Alliance will distribute the series internationally.

"Going to cable first isn't that weird," says Bob Sanitsky, PolyGram president. "MGM and Showtime have proven [that strategy] to be very successful. You can be an immense success on Showtime and still have a big audience that hasn't had access to it."

Sanitsky argues that the pay TV window will help the series because "Showtime has demonstrated over and over that it has a great ability to promote and market shows. We'll get valuable promotion on their air."

Sanitsky praises John Symes, MGM's president of worldwide distribution: "He was brilliant in how he built that company. I looked carefully at how they developed their business. I'll be shocked if [MGM's] Stargate isn't this season's most successful show. We're hoping Total Recall 2070 will be next season's."

Gracious in the face of new competition, MGM's Symes concedes that "we would love to have this deal all to ourselves, but it makes sense to duplicate the pay cable-to-syndication model."

Still, Symes cautions, the pay cable-to-syndication opportunities are limited. "Showtime is only going to do so much original programming," he says. "I don't believe HBO would want to give up the exclusivity, and stations might have more reservations with the greater exposure of HBO."

PolyGram plans to officially launch the series in the international market at MIPCOM this week, and although no deals have been closed, Sanitsky says international sales are expected to make up more than 70%-80% of the series budget.

Creatively, Total Recall 2070 will draw more closely from the Philip K. Dick novel than the box-office blockbuster. Sanitsky describes the series as "a futuristic sci-fi police drama. We're very much a thinking man's show," he says. "We've kept a lot of intriguing elements of the movie, but we've set it up so it will work for 100 episodes."

Set in 2070, the first season's episodes will focus primarily on life on Earth as the colonization of Mars begins. "A great movie only has to worry about two hours," explains Sanitsky. "A great TV series needs a hundred."

Total Recall 2070 stars Michael Easton; supervising producer is Jeff King, and the writer is Art Monasterelli.

pulls decent ratings, because Studios USA wants to put its muscle behind breakaway hits.

Sachs Family Entertainment’s The New Adventures of Robin Hood is in syndication this season after a bouncy beginning on TNT. The New Adventures of Robin Hood has been revamped with more money, new producers and a new star.

“Without a station group, I don’t think I would launch,” says Rysher Entertainment’s domestic distribution president, Ira Bernstein. “Everything else is doomed.” (Chris Craft’s stations came on board for Rysher’s Highlander sequel.)

Moreover, virtually no one dares bring a product—even sci-fi and fantasy—to market without a recognizable name. Earth: Final Conflict has Gene Roddenberry’s NightMar comes from a comic book. Hercules, Robin Hood, and Conan are legendary figures. Xena and Highlander: The Rave are spin-offs. The Exorcist, The Crow, Total Recall, Poltergeist, Stargate and Mortal Kombat evolved from movies. Deep Space Nine has the Star Trek pedigree.

PolyGram President Bob Sanitsky says: “The Crow means something to its audience. It means rock ‘n’ roll, kick ass. I tried to build our first season’s efforts on a hook you could market to. If we don’t deliver a good show, we’ll fail with the same rate, but it does give us a leg up to get the sampling.”

And no programming genre, however popular, can surmount market realities. Chances are the high-water mark of sci-fi/fantasy programming already has been hit, and it’s no fault of the genre.

Katz’s Carroll says, “We’re at a key point. Three things are falling into place. There are a lot of shows, dramatically fewer time periods and we’re now in a shared cable-syndication environment for off-network hours. They’re all competing in key time periods for the same audience. The WB and UPN networks are eating up more and more time periods. Pretty soon they will be seven-day networks, and that will eliminate those sixth and seventh days for these shows.”

Indeed, this past season syndicators felt the encroachment of off-net series deliver the best ratings, they’ll get the best time periods.

“Regardless of the genre,” Larsen concludes, “the number of syndicated hours year to year is down, and fewer still are being proposed for next year.”

Next season, there will be at least a few new sci-fi/fantasy series, including several big names—PolyGram’s

The Return of ‘The Exorcist’

Tribune Entertainment is teaming with Morgan Creek Productions to bring The Exorcist to television in 1999. The two companies are co-developing and co-financing Exorcist: The Series, a weekly action hour that will be based on the 1973 feature film and William Peter Blatty novel. Tribune is selling the series domestically, while Morgan Creek will handle foreign distribution with Warner Bros.

The series will be based on the film and novel, but will be set in the present and will follow the central character’s investigation of “mysterious conflicts between good and evil supernatural forces.”

“As last season’s ratings demonstrate, audiences and broadcasters clearly have a healthy appetite for action-adventure programming,” says Dick Askin, president and CEO of Tribune Entertainment. “Exorcist: The Series will allow us to create exciting story arcs for viewers, and it is a promising franchise that will have tremendous appeal in both the domestic and international markets.”

CBS details spin-off plan in SEC filing

By Steve McClellan

CBS President Mel Karmazin earned a $3 million bonus on top of his $925,000 salary in 1997, according to recent documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission. (The documents detail the planned public spin-off of about 20% of the company's radio group operations.)

The bonus and salary are in addition to some 11 million shares and options Karmazin holds as the single largest shareholder in the company.

The spin-off of the radio group, which will trade under the name Infinity Broadcasting, is expected to generate a minimum of $3.2 billion, (based on a value of 16 times the group's annual cash flow of $1 billion). But CBS executives have told analysts they feel a valuation of 20-23 times cash flow is more appropriate. If the offering can achieve that valuation, CBS would get $4.2 billion-$4.6 billion.

CBS executives say they hope to execute the public offering between now and year's end. Analysts say the recent volatility in the market shouldn't hamper that timetable, given Infinity's and Karmazin's track record in revenue and profit generation. In 1997, the company had 20% revenue growth and a 29% gain in EBITDA.

Karmazin will serve as chairman, president and chief executive officer of Infinity Broadcasting—and, under an intercompany agreement with CBS, will continue to serve as CBS's chief operating officer.

Three other CBS executives will serve as executive officers of the new Infinity, including Farid Suleman, who will be executive vice president and chief financial officer. As CFO of the CBS radio group, Suleman earned $500,000 in salary and a $1 million bonus in 1997.

Daniel Mason, president of Infinity Radio Group, earned $815,000 in salary and $400,000 in bonuses. William Apfelbaum, president and chief executive of TDI, the outdoor advertising firm that is part of Infinity, earned $950,000 in salary and a $1 million bonus in 1997.

The SEC documents state that Infinity is expected to adopt a long-term incentive plan with various stock awards and options and that both Karmazin and Suleman will be eligible for the program and will continue to be eligible to receive awards under the separate CBS long-term incentive plan.

While 20% of the radio group, which includes the outdoor advertising company, will be spun off, all of the voting control, in the form of a separately held class B stock, will be retained by CBS.

CBS described the new Infinity as being in the "out-of-home" media business, "because more than two-thirds of radio listening and virtually all viewing of outdoor advertising takes place" outside the home. Out-of-home media, CBS said, are "attractive alternatives" to in-home media, the audience for which is becoming increasingly fragmented by greater competition.

The lead underwriter for the Infinity stock offering is Merrill Lynch.

Mathes heads Chris Craft stations

Chris Craft/United Television executives have promoted one of their own to run their 10 TV stations. Peter Mathes, who has worked for the company for 16 years, has been named executive vice president of the Chris Craft/United Television Group. Mathes replaces Bill Frank, who will be leaving at the end of the year to pursue a variety of investment opportunities, Chris Craft executives say.

Mathes joined Chris Craft in 1982 as national sales manager at the Group's Los Angeles station, kcor(tv). He moved up the company ranks before being named general manager at Chris Craft's Salt Lake City station, ktvx(tv), in 1991.

"Every time we have given him a new task, he has been able to produce successful results, and he has demonstrated that he is a very talented executive with great management capabilities, and he's done that for 16 years now," says Evan Thompson, Chris Craft/United's president. "He knows how our stations run, and I think we are very lucky to have someone so talented within the company ready to step in. I really think we are going to have a smooth transition."

In addition to the stations, Mathes will head United Television Sales, a national sales rep firm owned by United Television. —Joe Schlosser
Bohbot kids network will be anchored by Chris Craft

By Joe Schlosser

The children's syndication industry has lost another one of its top players. This time it's Bohbot Entertainment and Media.

Bohbot is going the way of Saban Entertainment, Walt Disney Co. and Warner Bros., into the children's broadcast network business. But the New York-based children's syndicator, which first launched Sonic the Hedgehog on TV stations in 1992, is going about it a little differently.

Over the past few years, the top three children's syndicators all have aligned themselves with a broadcast network outlet. Saban teamed with Fox Broadcasting to produce the Fox Kids Network. Disney distributes its children's fare on ABC and UPN and Warner Bros. distributes its product on The WB. Bohbot, which has no large parent company to distribute its ever-growing library of animated and live-action series, is going to take a shot at it alone, sort of.

The distributor has added the Chris Craft/United Television Group as its distribution anchor and Columbia TriStar Television as a programming partner—but for the most part, Bohbot is on its own.

"Whenever you are starting something new and you are facing formidable competition like Fox, Disney and Warner Bros., you've got to zig when they zag," says Allen Bohbot, Bohbot's chairman. "And that's exactly what we are going to do."

So, starting next August, Bohbot will begin distributing two 12-hour-a-week children's services under the aegis of The Bohbot Kids Network (BKN). The two programming blocks—BKN Action Adventure (which will program to boys ages 6 to 11) and BKN Cartoon Classics (designed for both boys and girls 2 to 11)—will be sold separately to stations. In some instances they will play against each other in individual markets.

The two programming blocks will air at 7 a.m.-9 a.m. during the week and will also have a two-hour play on Sunday.

Days. Ratings from each block, the BKN Action Adventure and BKN Cartoon Classics, will be cumed (combined) each week to produce a single BKN national Nielsen Media Research rating. That, in turn, say Bohbot executives, will result in higher CPMs from advertisers.

Former New World Entertainment programming chief Rick Ungar has been brought in as CEO and chairman of the new BKN network. Ungar believes the BKN formula is going to surprise the naysayers and capture a market that the three bigger children's networks are neglecting.

"Everybody who has talked to us has asked us why we would do this now," says Ungar. "They say the kids business is in total chaos. To us, that's precisely when we want to do this. If you look at what is going on out there, there is a serious loss of clarity in terms of these kids networks and who they are trying to reach. Our advantage is that we have a very clear perspective on whom we are trying to reach."

BKN Action Adventure will feature a number of new animated programs in its daily two-hour lineup, including Roswell Conspiracies and spin-offs from the recent film "Starship Troopers" and the 1980s Rambo film franchise. The BKN Cartoon Classics net will carry library product from Bohbot plus new episodes of Sonic Underground. Bohbot is putting $100 million behind the launch of the two services.

Bohbot executives say the BKN Network already is cleared on 193 stations, representing 92% of the country. Allen Bohbot says there are a number of benefits to having a network format instead of just selling each of his company's series one by one to stations. "As a network-type concept, we can change the programs at random and take advantage of our vast library to replace a show if it is not working," Bohbot says. "That benefits the station, the advertisers and us. You can't do that in syndication.

Nevertheless, in a "somewhat contradictory" finding, Latino viewers generally are satisfied with what they see on TV and how they are portrayed, says the study, which was funded by Time Warner, HBO and the Anheuser-Busch Companies. "They are...both satisfied and dissatisfied and seek a more complete and nuanced picture of Latinos on television," the study says.

One clear criticism: There is not enough educational programming on Spanish-language TV. More than two-thirds of those with an opinion agreed to that. About one-third also said that positive role models for their children are absent.

It would be to programmers' and advertisers' advantage to address Latinos' concerns, the study says. It confirms that Hispanics are major consumers of TV: Thirty percent of the respondents said they watch more than five hours a day, while another 34% watch four to five hours daily. Seventy-five percent watch both Spanish- and English-language shows.

The study surveyed 1,013 Latinos by telephone in the five states with the largest Latino populations: California, Texas, New York, Florida and Illinois. It has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.3%.

Latinos satisfied, dissatisfied with TV

Nearly 42% of Latino TV viewers say they never see characters of their own ethnicity on English-language entertainment programs, while fewer than 40% see a Hispanic anchor or newscaster on the English-language news program they watch most frequently, according to a study by the University of Illinois for the Tomas Rivera Policy Institute. And when confronted with what they see as stereotypes, 49.2% of the respondents said they turn off. Nevertheless, in a "somewhat contradictory" finding, Latino viewers generally are satisfied with what they see on TV and how they are portrayed, says the study, which was funded by Time Warner, HBO and the Anheuser-Busch Companies. "They are...both satisfied and dissatisfied and seek a more complete and nuanced picture of Latinos on television," the study says.

Partial save for the Bruins

Boston’s UPN affiliate WSBK-TV will end its low-rated three-year-old evening newscast this week: the program had been produced by the New England Cable News network. The regional cable network will continue to provide some news for the station in updates for broadcast during Boston Bruins hockey games.

NECN President Phil Balboni acknowledges that he was disappointed, but says that it was “absolutely the right decision for Channel 38 to make. News was not their strategic strong suit. People weren’t really looking to that station for news.”

Stu Tauber, vice president and general manager of Ch. 38, says “the decision reflects tough competition at 10 p.m., and the changing reality of television, where the most successful stations and networks focus on their specialty. For UPN and WSBK, that is entertainment, programming and local sports.”

The shift in programming again raises the issue of WSBK-TV owner Paramount Stations’ long-range plan for news. Newscasts are part of programming in only a handful of Paramount stations, and the Boston move is the third reduction in news this summer.

Only a few weeks ago, Paramount announced that UPN affiliate KMAX-TV (Sacramento, Calif.), was scrapping its evening newscast, although it expanded its morning show. A month before, Paramount pulled the plug on its 50-person, one-hour-daily news operation at WTGD-TV St. Petersburg, Fla.

There’s something about Jane

Among numerous criticisms of TV news, Watergate reporter Carl Bernstein advised the large assembly of news directors at an RTNDA luncheon that their business had been “disfigured by celebrity worship.” His remarks, which appeared to be well-received, were followed by a mad dash upstairs by hundreds of the hard-core news people for a session entitled “One on One with Jane Pauley.”

(Cause of) action news

The “public figure” defense took on an odd twist in a libel suit brought against WFAA-TV Dallas. The plaintiff, whose designation as a public figure left him without a case, was himself a TV reporter. WFAA-TV lost on summary judgment motions before a trial court and appeals court.

But the state’s highest court reversed those actions, finding that WFAA-TV’s voluntary acts invited public attention and made him a “limited-purpose public figure.” WFAA-TV got closer to the action than other reporters did, the court noted, and “assumed a risk that his involvement in the event would be subject to public debate.” Moreover, the court noted, the reporter discussed his “considerable personal risk,” and “portray[ed] himself as a hero in assisting wounded ATF agents while his journalistic colleagues were pinned down in a ditch.

Sullivan’s travels

Robert Sullivan—who left Gannett’s flagship station, WUSA-TV (Washington, D.C.) in July—has resurfaced with the Broadcast Image Group. Sullivan’s tenure at WUSA was a difficult one, with considerable bad press about low morale and low ratings—although he maintained that leaving was his own idea, prompted by a desire to move his family back West. He’ll have that opportunity with the San Antonio–based consulting group.

After a successful run at KPNX-TV (Phoenix), Sullivan was a star at Gannett before he took over at WUSA. He was even considered a possible successor to president Cecil Walker.

He’ll likely have a chance to put his experience with that company to work; Broadcast Image Group is considered popular among Gannett stations.

Nexis connection

Veteran TV newsman Kevin Roach showed up at RTNDA’s San Antonio annual conference late last month, but not as a news director. He has become associate publisher, media, for Lexis-Nexis (which is co-owned with Broadcasting & Cable).

In June, Roach and a dozen others lost their jobs at WDTN-TV when Sunrise Television took over, Roach who had previously worked for ABC News and New England Cable News, will help develop Web-based Nexis products for the news industry, including customizable search tools similar to those on the Internet.

Roach’s station had recently won a slew of RTNDA, AP and Cleveland Press Association awards. But it seemed like a good time to make a move—or not make a move; as the Lexis-Nexis position made it possible for Roach and family to remain in Dayton.

Jane Pauley says TV news is too loud

By Steve McClellan

Dateline NBC anchor Jane Pauley says TV news could use some toning down. “I would like to see less volume on the news,” she said. “It’s as if Jackie Gleason was running the show. Everybody’s shouting.”

Pauley made her comments in her Paul White Award acceptance speech at the Radio-Television News Directors Association convention Saturday, Sept. 26. The award recognizes the recipient’s achievements in and contributions to the field of television journalism.

Pauley also said the news business has “taken some self-inflicted hits” to its credibility. “We simply have to earn it back,” she said. She cited two completely fabricated tales in the tabloid press about her own life. She also cited a fabricated quote, pulled from the Internet, allegedly made by special prosecutor Kenneth Starr in a 60 Minutes interview—an interview he never gave.

With some glee, Pauley noted that the circulation of some tabloid newspapers has declined. “I think we can all guess why,” she said. “You couldn’t make up the stuff we’ve been reporting lately.”

With so much competition, Pauley said, “never has the distinction between journalists and showmen and charlatans and manipulators been more critical.”

On a positive note, Pauley said it was good news that prime time magazines have been “thoroughly integrated, by gender at least. We’ve even seen evidence that it’s OK for a woman to get older.”

Like Dan Rather, last year’s Paul White Award recipient, Pauley said she didn’t deserve it. “In the meantime, I will accept on the condition that it comes with the expectation that I spend the rest of my career trying to live up to it.”

You’re never too old to learn

A 13-episode series described as “Sesame Street for adults” will debut on PBS stations this fall. TV411, from the Adult Literacy Media Alliance (ALMA) and executive producer Marian Schwarz, is a half-hour that targets adults using an instructional approach “designed to enhance reading, writing and math skills,” but delivered in sitcom, talk show, documentary and sports show settings. Among the celebrities featured in the show are the late Florence Griffith Joyner, Liz Torres, Phoebe Snow, Oscar winner Kathy Bates and members of the Dallas Cowboys and the WNBA’s Detroit Shock. Among the stations are WNET(TV) New York, WQED(TV) Pittsburgh, KCTS-TV Seattle. ALMA is a video-based literacy project with major funding from the Ford Foundation.

Pax passes

Conspicuous by its absence at the Hollywood Radio and Television Society’s annual fall programming luncheon two weeks ago was Pax TV. The network start-up, launched on Aug. 31, was the only one of the seven broadcast networks not to send a top programming executive to the lunch at L.A.’s posh Century Plaza Hotel. Paxson Communications President Jeff Sagansky, who is based at Pax TV’s West Palm Beach, Fla., headquarters and spends about a week a month in Los Angeles, “had wanted to do it, and his schedule was very busy, and he couldn’t work it out,” a Pax TV official said. HRTS executive director Gene Herd said he expects Sagansky to be invited next year. Separately, Pax TV said it recorded a 1.1 rating average in its first four weeks, according to Nielsen Media Research metered-market ratings. National numbers have yet to be released.

Fox wraps up New Line package

Fox Broadcasting appears to have emerged as the winner in the bidding for a package of broadcast TV rights for New Line films that include recent Jackie Chan action hit "Rush Hour," as well as "Blade" and "Lost in Space." Sources say Fox has all but wrapped up the rights in a five-year contract at an undisclosed price. Fox and New Line officials declined comment.

Paramount clears 'Sabrina,' 'Clueless'

Paramount Domestic Television has cleared Sabrina, the Teenage Witch and Clueless to the Tribune-owned stations in the top three U.S. markets. The series will debut on WPIX-TV New York, KTLA(TV) Los Angeles and WGN-TV Chicago in Sept. 2000. Both series are entering their third seasons in prime time. Sabrina on ABC and Clueless on UPN. Both series are now being sold to stations. Sabrina on a cash-plus basis and Clueless on straight barter.

Sabrina the preteen witch

Buena Vista Television is adding an animated version of the ABC live-action series Sabrina, the Teenage Witch to its two-hour children's programming block set to debut in 1999. DIC Entertainment and Paul Hart/Heartbreak Productions are co-producing the series. The show, a prequel to the prime time series, introduces the witch at age 12. Melissa Joan Hart and Nick Bakay are two of the celebrities lending their voices to the project.

NATPE registration up

Registration for the 1999 NATPE Conference in New Orleans is pacing 25% ahead of last year. Executives from the nonprofit organization say. Already, 335 companies—100 of them international—have signed on to be exhibitors. The conference has already sold 365,100 square feet of the conference floor.

Pearson launches mall strip

Pearson Television has officially launched its proposed syndicated talk show for fall 1999, Christopher and Camilla at the Mall. The hour strip will be produced and taped at a major U.S. shopping mall and will draw from stores and shoppers for the content of the show. Christopher Lowell, formerly the host of Discovery Channel's Interior Motives, and Camilla Scott, who for the past three years has hosted her own talk show in Canada, are the show's hosts.

Kasem counts the money

Pearson has added Casey Kasem to its soon-to-launch game show 100%. Kasem, known for his long-running syndicated radio program, American Top 40, will serve as the game's "quiz master," who is heard but not seen. Pearson executives are selling 100% into syndication for a January 1999 launch. The game, which Pearson already produces internationally, features three contestants in a fast-paced Jeopardy-like format competing for as much as $100,000.

Povich scores

Maury Povich's syndicated talk show, which changed distributors this season (from Paramount to Studios USA), averaged a 3.1 rating/12 share during its second week of the season, according to Nielsen Media Research. Povich improved over its first week of the year, in which the show scored a 2.8/11 in the metered markets. On WNBC(TV) New York, Maury scored a 3.9/14 last week, up from a 2.8/11 its first week of the new TV year.

‘Roseanne' signed for 37 territories

ing World International has signed agreements to broadcast The Roseanne Show in 37 different international territories. The former sitcom star's new daytime talker will be seen in the United Kingdom (Channel 5 and UK Living), Australia (Network 10), South Africa (SABC3) and a number of other countries.

ATAS picks 8 inductees

The Academy of Television Arts & Sciences has selected eight new inductees for its Hall of Fame. This year's list consists of Herb Brodkin (The Defenders), Carl Reiner (The Dick Van Dyke Show; 12 Emmys), Robert MacNeil and Jim Lehrer (MacNeilLehrer Hour), Fred Silverman (head of programming at CBS, NBC and ABC), Lorne Michaels (Saturday Night Live), Ethel Winant (the first female vice president at CBS) and Fred Rogers (Mr. Rogers' Neighborhood). The announcement was made last Monday (Sept. 28) at Disney-MGM Studios in Orlando.

Radio Show will tune in on consolidation, competition

Seattle convention runs Oct. 14-17

By Elizabeth A. Rathbun

Radio broadcasters may be sleepless in Seattle next week during the annual NAB Radio Show, where a stimulating mix of hot topics and provocative speakers should prove as eye-opening as a cup of homegrown Starbucks coffee.

The convention floor also is likely to be abuzz: The industry’s continuing consolidation, the ongoing “correction” of the stock market and increasing competition from pirate, Internet and satellite radio are probable subjects.

“And,” promises John David, executive vice president of the National Association of Broadcasters’ radio department, “it’s not going to rain.”

So far this year, registration is running 25%-30% ahead of last year’s attendance of 7,246, with exhibitor space at the Washington Convention Center sold out to 170 companies. Broadcasters clearly are looking forward to meeting in Seattle for the first time. David says.

Rain or shine, billionaire Sam Zell may be forced to address rumors that his Jacor Communications Inc. is for sale. Zell is the keynote speaker for the show, which convenes next Wednesday (Oct. 14) and ends Saturday (Oct. 17). Rumors of a Jacor deal, which have swirled for a year, recently heated up again as Chancellor Media Corp. and CBS Corp. battle to be the nation’s largest radio group.

“There are a lot of issues very much on people’s minds right now,” says William L. McElveen, NAB Radio Board chairman and executive vice president of Bloomington Broadcasting Corp. For example, “How far is consolidation going to go?”

The unsteady stock market has made it more difficult to attract new capital, trimming some aggressive expansion plans, McElveen says. It also has cooled plans for initial public offerings, he says.

With many radio groups already combined in major markets, smaller markets are the next logical targets. That’s one of the reasons that this year’s annual panel of radio group chiefs will include officials from companies with holdings in smaller markets, such as Citadel Communications Corp. and Cumulus Media Inc., David says.

Also during the panel, Chancellor President Jeffrey A. Marcus is expected to explain how his company is redefining consolidation. Chancellor is pulling together radio, TV and billboard holdings and trying to sell advertisers on overlapping buys that Marcus says are more efficient than buying space in the local newspaper.

Consolidation is the centerpiece of Wednesday morning’s eighth-annual “Broadcast Financing for the 1990s,” which will address acquisition opportunities and financing two years after the Telecommunications Act of 1996. David W. Beier, Vice President Gore’s chief domestic policy adviser, is to make the opening remarks.

FCC Chairman William Kennard is scheduled to address the convention next Friday, with Commissioner Harold Furchtgot-Roth making an appearance the day before. Broadcasters are looking to the commissioners to address minority ownership, microradio and low-power and “pirate” radio, David says.

‘Day in the life’ details listening

Do more listeners tune into radio near the top of the hour? Are more people listening at 6 p.m. than at 6 a.m.? Does listening drop to almost nothing during TV’s prime time hours? According to a first-of-its-kind analysis by Interpre Research, the answer is an emphatic “no” to all of the above.

In a report based on average numbers for the top 10 markets in the spring 1996 Arbitron survey, there appears to be no discernible pattern in tune-in habits among the four quarter-hours (no more tune-ins at the top of the hour than, say, at a quarter past), although the study authors caution that some formats and specific programming and promotional campaigns will affect these generic trackings.

Throughout the typical broadcast day, average quarter hour (AQH) listening remains “fairly steady,” with the daily peak coming at 7-9 a.m. and the top AQH at 7:30-7:45 a.m. weekdays. There is one exception to this peak AQH in the top 10 metros: Houston peaks earlier—at 7:15-7:30 a.m. in the day’s top-rated hour—7-8 a.m.—nearly six of every 10 Americans 12 years and older (58%) are tuned to their favorite stations. The runner-up peak hour for all-persons listening is the 8-9 a.m. block.

Besides a.m. drive-time, there are noticeable peaks around noon and 4 p.m., and audience reach for all-persons never dips below 50% from noon to 5 p.m. Through the AQH tracking of 6 a.m.—midnight, the scale shows a dramatic jump of tune-ins beginning at 6 a.m., a 7:30 a.m. spike, a slow decrease until about 11 a.m., a less dramatic spike at noon, a slow decline to midafternoon, a rise and steady listening between 3-5 p.m., and then a gradual decrease after 6 p.m. until the least-listened-to days of late night and overnight.

Although the smallest audiences in the top 10 markets come during the 8-11 p.m. period (TV’s prime time), the study finds that radio still reaches about 25% or more of all persons 12-plus, hourly. At-work listening can be charted via a logical bell curve, climbing dramatically during the 8-9 a.m. hour, remaining steady across the late morning and early afternoon, and then rising slightly in the later afternoon before dipping after 4 p.m., when workers begin to leave offices and factories.

At this stage, the at-work numbers evolve into in-car listening ratings, with a sharp jump at 4-5 p.m. and an overall peak in the 5-6 p.m. hour.

The first in-car peak, however, comes in the 7-9 a.m. slot. The morning curve peak for all persons is slightly below its afternoon counterpart, according to Arbitron’s MaxiMiser: The 7-8 a.m. peak achieves a cume rating of 58.1, while the late-afternoon cume peak registers 55.9.

Basic breaks more records

News helps power cable to personal best in 3rd quarter

By Donna Petrozzello

Boosted by breaking news coverage, sports and strong summer ratings, basic cable networks belted out their best-ever ratings and audience shares for a third quarter.

According to Nielsen Media Research, the top 35 basic cable networks averaged a 23.8 rating/44 share for a total of 23.4 million homes in third quarter 1998 (June 29 to Sept. 27), record-setting levels for a quarter.

Cable's third-quarter rating and share each marked a 13% increase over third-quarter 1997 levels.

Basic cable networks also celebrated another ratings victory during the week of September 21-27, season premiere week among the broadcast networks.

During that week, the top 35 cable networks increased their prime time ratings and share by 14% compared with their performance during broadcast networks' season premiere week a year earlier. According to an analysis of Nielsen data by the Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau, basic cable networks averaged a 23.2 rating/38.5 share with 23 million homes in prime time for the week of Sept. 21-27.

By contrast, the CAB reported that broadcasters ABC/CBS/NBC and Fox averaged a 34.4 rating/57 share with 34 million homes in prime time, representing an 8.5% loss in rating, a 9.1% loss of share and a 7.3% decline in household delivery during its most recent week of season premiers as compared with season-premiere week last year.

While cable was doing a victory dance, the Television Bureau of Advertising maintains that the analysis of ratings by Turner and the CAB is unfairly skewed to maximize basic cable ratings and scale back ratings for broadcast networks. TVB vice president of research and development, Harold Simpson, says their analysis compares "all of basic, ad-supported cable networks to selected broadcast networks," which he described as "improper." Simpson says rather than provide the average rating of the top four broadcasters as 24.1, the analysts should add in ratings generated by independent broadcast groups, including Univision, Pax TV, Telemundo and scattered other local broadcast stations, not to mention the WB and UPN, which would elevate broadcasters' prime time average rating last quarter to 30.4.

"Their analysis excludes the newer broadcast networks such as Pax TV. The WB and UPN, which by definition are the ones that are growing," says Simpson. "To simply not include them, from a research and ethical standpoint, is wrong." USA was the top-rated network for the third quarter, averaging a 2.2/1.6 million homes compared with last year's 2.1/1.5 million. Nickelodeon/ Nick at Nite ranked second in prime time, earning a 2.1/1.5 million homes for the most recent quarter. TNT ranked third, with a 1.9/1.4 million homes.

Although TNT's ratings were solid enough to rank it third in prime time, they were from TNT's prime time average 2.4 rating in third quarter 1997. Last year, TNT ratings were boosted largely by its NFL coverage, which shifted to ESPN beginning with the 1998-99 season. Turner officials contend that, excluding football events, TNT ratings in third quarter 1997 would have averaged a 1.9. Turner also says that TNT's household delivery in prime time was up 4% in the most recent quarter, to 1,397,000, from 1,377,000 last year.

CNN continued to lead basic cable news channels for the quarter. CNN's prime time ratings improved to a 1.2/859,000, compared with a 1.0/377,000 in prime time last year. In total day, CNN earned a 0.6/434,000 for the quarter, compared with a 0.5/372,000.

Fox News Channel averaged a 1.9/1.5 rating for the quarter, making it the top-rated cable news network, beating CNN in total day and prime time. Fox News Channel's prime time average rating of a 1.0/782,000 was higher than CNN's prime time average rating of a 0.9/511,000.

0.4/147,000 in prime time in third quarter 1998, compared with a 0.1/23,000 for third quarter 1997. In total-day ratings, FNC recorded a 0.2/72,000 compared with 0.1/17,000 homes for the same quarter last year. Some of that growth could be explained by the fact that over the past year, FNC’s household universe has increased from 24 million to 34 million subs, according to Nielsen.

CNBC’s ratings also spiked in the most recent quarter, averaging a 0.8/532,000 homes in prime time, compared with a 0.4/258,000 homes in prime time in third quarter 1997. In total day, CNBC earned a 0.5/304,000 in the most recent quarter, compared with a 0.3/169,000 last year.

MSNBC averaged a 0.5/201,000 in prime time in third quarter 1998, compared with 0.3/99,000 last year. In total day for third quarter 1998. MSNBC averaged a 0.3/142,000 homes, compared with a 0.2/68,000 last year.

Propelled by coverage of a reinvigorated Major League Baseball, ESPN’s prime time ratings jumped to 1.8/1.3 million, from 1.5/1 million last year.

Overall, cable networks celebrated their ratings against the backdrop of an overall ratings decline among the broadcast networks for third quarter 1998.

According to Turner Broadcasting System’s analysis of Nielsen data, broadcasters ABC/CBS/NBC/Fox/WT and UPN averaged a prime time rating of 25.4, a 10% decrease from third quarter 1997. Likewise, the six networks averaged a 25 million household audience in prime time for the past quarter, a 9% decrease from a year ago, according to Turner (based on Nielsen data).

Several networks recorded the best ratings quarter in their history.

The Learning Channel finished its best quarter ever, earning a 0.8/626,000 homes in prime time, up 14% in ratings and 35% in delivery for prime time compared with the same quarter a year ago, according to Nielsen. Likewise, History Channel celebrated its highest quarterly ratings ever, earning a 0.7/337,000 homes in prime time, up 40% in ratings and 61% in delivery over last year.

Meanwhile, The Weather Channel tallied its best-ever weekly ratings and household delivery—0.9/619,000 homes in total day—when Hurricane Georges blasted the Gulf Coast.

Cartoon Network set a new household delivery record, bringing in an average 809,000 homes in prime time and 546,000 homes total day, according to Cartoon. Cartoon also matched its highest ratings to date, averaging a 1.6 in prime time for the past quarter.

MTV saw an average 20% gain in total-day ratings and 13% gain in prime time ratings over the past quarter. E! posted a 67% increase in prime time and a 59% increase in delivery over the past quarter, earning a 0.5/233,000, compared with a 0.3/147,000 homes in prime time last year.

Sci-Fi Channel reported its best September ratings ever, a 0.8/397,000 homes in prime time, boosted by remastered original Star Trek episodes.

Liberty creates interactive TV division

By Price Colman

After years of false starts, stumbles and failures, interactive television appears poised for at least a modest revival, according to the brain trust at Liberty Media Corp.

Based on that cautious optimism, Liberty has created a new division—Liberty Interactive—to serve as midwife at interactive TV’s birth. Liberty executives see the development of advanced digital set-top boxes and other “convergence appliances” as the enabling tools for interactive TV.

Coupled with the announcement of the venture’s formation, Liberty Media President Robert “Dob” Bennett named E! Entertainment head honcho Lee Masters president of Liberty Interactive and TCI interactivity guru Bruce Ravenel executive vice president and chief technology officer.

Unlike most other interactive TV start-ups, the Liberty division is holding several face cards that could help make the wager on interactivity a winner.

First, Liberty Interactive has access to distribution through TCI (soon to be AT&T Consumer Services Co.) cable systems. Sources familiar with the companies say that Liberty and AT&T have what amounts to an agreement in principle giving Liberty interactive access to what will be TCI’s roughly 10.5 million U.S. cable customers once it closes on all pending deals.

Although a deal between Liberty and AT&T “is not worked out in any detail,” says a source, “there is an arrangement that provides access to distribution for interactive channels.”

Next, Liberty holds interests in the strongest programming stable in cable, with pieces of everything from Discovery, Fox/Liberty Sports and Rainbow to USA Network and entities in TCI Music. Liberty Media is contributing its 86% interest in TCI Music to the interactive venture.

Nonetheless, there’s still a good deal of lingering skepticism about interactive TV in financial circles.

“Show me a product and I’ll tell you what I think,” says Mark Riely of Media Group Research. “I don’t know if the economics are there.”

The music venue, through The Box on cable and SonicNet on the Internet, is a prime candidate for adding interactivity that could include point-and-click access to supplemental information about artists and easy ordering of CDs, says Masters, who takes over at Liberty Interactive Jan. 1.

Masters joining Liberty

Former E! Entertainment Network President Lee Masters is joining Liberty Media Corp. to head Liberty Interactive, a new division designed to develop interactive programming for use on emerging digital set-top boxes and the Internet (see story, this page). Two weeks ago, Masters announced he was leaving E! after almost nine years at the channel and said he was “intrigued by the convergence of the set-top box and the Web and television.” Masters says he’ll work through his contract term with E!, which expires Dec. 31, before joining Liberty in January.

Masters moves from cable to 'Net.

EchoStar outlines giveaway

DirecTV, Primestar don’t appear inclined to show similar largess in terms of giving away hardware

By Price Colman

With EchoStar Communications Corp.’s Charlie Ergen upping the ante again in the subscriber acquisition game—this time with a free hardware offer—the question is: Will competitors follow suit?

EchoStar’s Dish Network last week said it is offering free satellite system hardware to new customers who sign up for a one-year subscription to Dish Network’s America’s Top 100 CD programming package (Broadcasting & Cable, Sept. 28). Customers must buy the $249 worth of hardware—dish and receiver—but receive an equal rebate upon payment of the first bill. The promotion runs through Dec. 31, encompassing the DBS industry’s prime selling season.

EchoStar’s promotion strongly targets high-end subscribers, not Dish Network’s strongest segment. The company has told analysts that it expects no more than 25%-30% of new customers to opt for the offer, which translates into only a modest $50-75 increase in per-subscriber acquisition costs. Some analysts think the subscriber gains through the promotion will be much lower.

“If they get 5%, that will be huge,” says Curt Alexander of Media Group Research.

So far, DirecTV and Primestar aren’t...

planning to match, although both have their own promotions in effect. DirecTV already is offering $200 worth of free programming to customers who sign up for its full-season NFL Sunday Ticket package. DirecTV also plans to repeat its past practice of giving away the last six weeks of the NFL Sunday Ticket package to new DirecTV customers who sign up after Nov. 1.

PrimeStar in late August launched its “value lease” promotion, which essentially offers PrimeStar hardware for $98. PrimeStar, which has the highest subscriber acquisition costs in the industry, has no plans to give away equipment, a spokesperson says.

DBS industry analysts generally consider EchoStar’s offer a savvy move, but give mixed assessments on whether there will be in-kind responses. They note that EchoStar, which makes its own equipment, has the lowest hardware costs in the DBS business and thus may be better equipped to discount hardware without getting hit too hard on the top and bottom lines. “DirecTV typically has followed suit, but this time around they say they’re not going to do it,” says Bear Stearns analyst Vijay Jayant. EchoStar’s move is no surprise. Jayant says, given DBS companies’ practice of offering new incentives when sub growth slackens. EchoStar stayed close to DirecTV in sub growth most of the second and third quarters—until August when DirecTV widened the gap.

Curt Alexander of Media Group Research says that while EchoStar’s promotion has merits, DirecTV’s approach of giving away programming may be better in the long run. “The more you devalue hardware, the more you increase the likelihood of churn,” he says.

Jimmy Schaeffer of The Carmel Group, publisher of DBS Investor newsletter, says whether and when competitors respond will largely be a function of how successful EchoStar’s promotion is. “If the number of subscribers gained is mighty, there will be some mighty big moves toward doing the same thing,” Schaeffer says. “The other companies can’t resist. They hate it, but when Charlie does this, they have to follow.”

As for whether DBS providers will ultimately give away hardware, that will depend on how tough the battle for subscribers gets. “They have a product that’s desireable,” says Janco Partners’ Ted Henderson. “There are hardware and programming costs to it. They can fiddle with it to make it look like a different offer. But the costs are sunk. It comes down to getting hooked up to the home and subscriber.”

USA takes the ‘Heat’

I n one of his first announcements since taking over as president of programming and marketing for USA Networks, Stephen Chao said last week that USA will extend its World Wrestling Federation Sunday Night Heat weekly series for an additional two years. Although USA intended to air WWF Sunday Night Heat as a special summer series, its 3.3 rating/2.5 million homes average over the past six weeks encouraged USA to extend its run, says Chao. USA says WWF Sunday Night Heat carried 22% better ratings on average in the Sunday night 7 p.m.–8 p.m. time slot than programming that aired there a year ago, according to USA, based on Nielsen data.

With WWF Sunday Night Heat, USA airs five hours of WWF coverage weekly in regular timeslots on Monday, Saturday and Sunday. USA debuted Sunday-night WWF on Aug. 2.

Ad revenue up

A dvertising revenues for 22 leading basic cable networks during the first half of 1998 totaled $2.7 billion, up more than $395 million from the same period in 1997, according to a monthly survey conducted by the Broadcast Cable Financial Management Association and reported by Cabletelevision Advertising Bureau (CAB). Based on strong early-year revenue gains, the CAB is predicting 1998 revenue for all basic cable networks to reach nearly $7 billion. Last year’s total was $6 billion.

Discriminating software

Sa telite TV distributor PrimeTime 24 has signed a contract to use DecisionMark’s software to identify whether potential customers can subscribe to PrimeTime 24’s service. PrimeTime 24 provides distant network signals for satellite TV companies, such as DirecTV. DecisionMark’s software will help PrimeTime 24 determine which subscribers must be cut off in compliance with a preliminary injunction against PrimeTime 24 issued by a federal district court in Miami. That injunction says PrimeTime 24 must disconnect all subscribers who signed up after March 11, 1997, and live in areas where they clearly receive over-the-air broadcast signals more than half the time.

B uena Vista Television is getting into the pay-per-view business. The Walt Disney Co. syndication unit is distributing a country music concert with Trisha Yearwood on Nov. 20, marking the company’s first PPV event. The 90-minute concert, called Trisha Yearwood: A Magical Night, will be taped at Walt Disney World and on Disney’s new cruise ship, Disney Magic. CWS logs into Internet access
Launches service to small and midsize operators

By Donna Petrozzello

With one cable operator affiliate already signed up, Cable Web Services is preparing a national rollout of an alternative high-speed cable Internet access service.

Last April, MetroCable of Philadelphia became the first to sign on to CWS's HomeStream cable data service, which the Philadelphia-based CWS intends to make available to small and midsize cable operators starting today (Oct. 5).

CWS co-founder and chief technology officer Steve Getz is hoping that the relative low cost of HomeStream to operators will help lure smaller operators. He contends that these smaller operators have not yet added Internet access to their menu of services because it has been cost-prohibitive.

Unlike the cable Internet access standard service DOCSIS (Data Over Cable Service Interface Specification), which requires cable operators to purchase modems and equipment, Getz says HomeStream provides free cable headend equipment for MSOs and free high-speed modems to subscribers.

In the HomeStream business model, the subscriber will pay for access to the Internet service provider of his choice and will pay an additional $19.95 charge per month for cable access. Getz says CWS and the operators take equal shares of revenue from the cable access monthly fee.

Customers will also pay to have an additional cable outlet installed near their PC at home and to have the modem installed, typically a one-time charge of about $50, says Getz. Consumers typically may pay more than $200 for a modem to connect them to various ISP providers, he says.

The MSO provides and pays for the connection from the Internet to the cable headend, which Getz pegs at nearly $2,000 per month, and for marketing support for HomeStream. CWS Vice President of Marketing Geri Gleeson estimates that marketing costs will range from $12,000 per year for small MSOs (systems with about 10,000 subscribers) to $30,000 for midsize MSOs (systems with about 50,000 subscribers).

"The company looked at the standard DOCSIS equipment and believed that the costs associated with it, both at the consumer level and at the operator's level, were exorbitant," says Getz. Michael Ross and James Horton are co-founders of CWS with Getz. Before launching the company, Getz was co-founder of computer backup technology company Vortex Systems, was a director at NetFrame Systems and also founded Workhorse Systems, a systems integration company.

Horton, a communications system design technician, also co-founded Vortex; Ross was manager of investor relations, mergers and acquisitions at Cheyenne Software.

Getz says CWS is privately funded with more than $2 million but has been actively soliciting venture capitalists. The company is hoping to reach a break-even point in 18 months, he says.

CWS predicts MSOs can break even after one year with HomeStream and that they will sign up 15% of their subscribers after five years.
K KYK goes virtual with Discreet Logic/Delvin

Little Rock station revamps news set and graphics equipment

By Karen Anderson

When KYKTV Little Rock, Ark., started its news operations last year, its set was "acceptable but boring," says the station's chief operating officer, Neal Ardman. Building a new hard set would be costly in itself, but in order to give the news programs an updated and polished look, the station also would have to upgrade its graphics systems. So Ardman began shopping around for virtual sets.

The WB affiliate chose Discreet Logic's Frost broadcast graphics and virtual set design system with Devlin Design Group's SoftSet virtual studio design and service system working with Silicon Graphics Onyx-2 workstations.

The $1 million system combines SoftSet's library of virtual set designs with Discreet Logic's Frost real-time 3-D broadcast graphics. According to Dan Devlin, Devlin CEO and creative director, KYK can chose six set designs for sports, business, interviews, election coverage and other uses.

Doug Krile, KYK news director and anchor, says: "The creativity is the biggest advantage. It absolutely removes all of the boxes... You no longer think [of just] over-the-shoulder graphics for your talent."

KYK's set will incorporate video walls that can display live video from remote feeds or tapes: "You have to completely rethink everything you know about the way things are supposed to look," Krile says.

He attributes the set's realistic look to Devlin's use of computer generated models of its hard sets. "When you look at most of the virtual sets... around, my definition of them is cartoonish," Krile says.

Ardman agrees: "[The other sets] looked surreal. [The talent] looked like they were in a video game."

Ardman says that Devlin and Discreet Logic were the only companies to offer solid solutions for integrating the set into its existing DVCPRO format and Kavouris weather system. "It wasn't vaporware; it really worked."

To offset the cost of the new set, the station plans to make it available for outside projects, such as music video and commercial production. Ardman says he believes the system eventually will pay for itself, but not for several years.

Krile says it was an economically smart decision because the station needed to replace an old video switcher and upgrade its graphics equipment. "By the time you buy new a switcher, upgrade the Chyron and add the effects—compare the price," he says. "That's where it begins to be cost-effective for us."

And from the perspective of on-air talent he says, "I'm thrilled to death with it."

The set is lit with a Videassence fluorescent lighting system, which eliminates excess heat. "Sitting under fluorescent light makes a spectacularly easier environment to work in," Krile says.

And although anchors sit at a blue desk surrounded by blue walls, the set offers them a relatively natural feel when they are anchoring, says Krile. The toughest part, he says, is learning to walk around in this virtual world and deal with perspective. In the virtual environment, an anchor standing within two feet of a co-anchor may appear on screen to be across the room.

The new set is slated to make its debut today (Oct. 5).

Mississippi ETV Goes DTV with Acrodyne

When Jackson, Miss., NBC affiliate WBBT-TV's transmitter tower collapsed last October, PBS affiliate WMTP-TV, which leased space there, was displaced. The Mississippi Authority for ETV station was forced to find a new transmission site and to buy a new transmitter.

Last week the station took delivery of an Acrodyne AuD-2S solid-state 2000W DTV transmitter. (Acrodyne had lent the station a 1 kw transmitter in the interim.) The 2.5 kw digital transmitter and Janpro side-mounted panel antenna are on a 300 foot self-supporting tower at ETV's production center in Jackson.

The station also has ordered an EFData SDM-2020 digital satellite video demodulator which will receive and feed PBS digital signals to a Nucomm DVB-to-SMPT 310 converter. A Zenith 8 VSB modulator will output a 9.4 Mb/s serial digital signal to the transmitter.

Martin Mangold, Mississippi ETV director of telecommunications, says the station initially will broadcast 1080i HDTV pass-through programming from PBS and plans to multicast beginning early next year. WMTP-TV also is preparing to provide original HDTV programming and is awaiting its FCC license to begin digital transmission.

If the station receives its permit in time, it will participate in PBS DTV week starting Nov. 11. PBS will provide one SDTV program full time with one 1080i HDTV prime time event. The network also will send two feeds with multiple 480i SDTV and time-delayed HDTV. All 1083i HDTV content will originate from a Sencore file server, and SDTV content will originate from Hewlett-Packard servers.

MSG employs Orad virtual set

Technology 'makes the show look bigger': network also sees advertising potential

By Glen Dickson

The Madison Square Garden Network is using a virtual set from Orad to give its MSG Sports Desk a new look.

The cable sports network has been successfully using the Orad Cyberset M system since Sept. 14, when sportscaster Marv Albert made his return to television as the show's host. According to Mike McCarthy, MSG Network senior vice president and executive producer, the biggest advantage of the virtual set is that it disguises MSG's cramped studio space—the blue screen grid for the virtual set is only 12 feet by 12 feet.

"It makes the show look bigger," McCarthy says. "We've always been limited in terms of TV studio space, being at a sports facility—we have nothing here you would call spacious. That's why we started to look at virtual sets at NAB." After lengthy research conducted by Dave Shaw, MSG Network vice president of technical operations, the network decided on a combination of Orad's virtual set technology with software modeling by SMA Video, a division of New York production house SMA Video. SMA Video which has been using an Orad set for more than a year, has used it to produce shows for Discovery Channel and ABC News.

The midrange Cyberset M system selected by MSG sells for just under $300,000 and includes an Ultimate chroma keyer, an SGI Onyx supercomputer and Orad software. SMA Fly Design has created five different set designs as part of the deal, says McCarthy.

The timing for getting MSG's turnkey system on the air was tight, according to Matt Straeb, Orad vice president/GM of North American operations. "We got the order, and three weeks later it was on the air," Straeb says. MSG's Shaw says the network tested the system for only four days before going on the air with it.

McCarthy says that he was confident about Orad's technology, partly from MSG's previous experimentation with Orad's Imadgine virtual signage system for Knicks games and the WTA Tennis Championships. "We're in an interesting position here at MSG," he adds. "We're not so small that we can't contemplate a technology like this, but we're not so big that we have to take a lot of time to work out a lot of imperfections. We had to take a chance, and we were confident. There was only one way to find out if it was going to work."

So far, McCarthy has been pleased with the system, but there have been some growing pains. Because MSG bought only one SGI Onyx with the system, there is no preview function for one of its two Sports Desk cameras (that would require a second Onyx). "That was a big adjustment at first—the camera guys not seeing a return," McCarthy says. He adds that MSG cameramen avoid blocking in the picture by making sure not to move their focus off the grid.

While MSG has yet to go full speed with all of the Orad set's capabilities, Sports Desk routinely uses the virtual technology to insert graphics, drop in virtual monitors for remote interviews and bring up Yankee Stadium as a live background behind Albert. The set

Time Warner to test SeaChange VOD system

Time Warner Cable has chosen SeaChange International as the first video-server supplier that it will evaluate as part of its Pegasus video-on-demand test.

Time Warner plans to test SeaChange's MediaCluster video server and its interactive television software in delivering VOD to viewers at an undisclosed system.

"This isn't a trial," says Jim Chiddix, Time Warner Cable chief technical officer. "We already know a lot about video on demand from Orlando [site of the Full Service Network trial]. This is a test of their equipment, which is a cost-effective server product for video on demand. Before we deploy it, we want to make sure we know it works."

Chiddix says there is no set timetable for the Pegasus VOD test. "This is all based on rolling digital set-tops out into the field," he says. He adds that testing of both Pioneer and Scientific-Atlanta set-tops in Austin, Tex., is going well, but "they're not quite ready for prime time yet. There's nothing to be gained here by putting out things that aren't rock-solid stable and ready for our customers."

The SeaChange servers and software will be tested in conjunction with Scientific-Atlanta Explorer 2000 digital set-tops by delivering VOD to customers with VCR-like functionality, including rewind, pause and fast-forward capabilities. "It will be VOD of the type we trialed in Orlando, but a lot cheaper," Chiddix says, referring to the high cost of the prototype equipment used in the Full Service Network trial.

Chiddix says the market knowledge that Time Warner gained in Orlando is "invaluable." Now that hardware prices have come down, the MSO may be able to turn that knowledge into revenue. "SeaChange's pricing is very interesting in terms of making video on demand into a good business," he adds.

—Glen Dickson
also is being integrated into pregame, intermission and postgame coverage for MSG and Fox Sports Net New York. McCarthy thinks the set also holds great advertising potential. "One thing where we're going to realize more benefit than we thought is the mobility of sponsored signage on the set," he says. "You can have different people buying different parts of an evening, and virtually pinning logos around the set. It can be tastefully done, and you don't have to give away the store to one guy."

Belot upgrades its news

By Karen Anderson

As stations sink big bucks into their DTV conversion, they often have to tighten belts to the news operation. But A.H. Belo has made a commitment to upgrade its news systems as part of a major overhaul of its network affiliates and cable operations.

"We are very proactive in high-definition conversion, but news is our primary franchise in most of our markets," says Craig Harper, Belo assistant manager of engineering. "So we spend the lion's share of our capital funds every year at each one of our stations on news and newsgathering."

In a move to increase its efficiency, Belo, which has been using Avid/BASYS since 1982, is upgrading its stations to AvidNews Newsroom Computer Systems and plans eventually to integrate all of its news bureaus. Harper says that desktop editing capabilities also will help increase productivity: "We believe [Avid's] partnership with Tektronix will only advance Avid's ability to do desktop editing."

He says the group will first use desktop editing integrated with Sony equipment at Texas Cable News (TXCN), which will convert to AvidNews in January. Sony will provide facility design and equipment for TXCN's new news production center in Dallas.

"When we advance Avid's ability to do desktop editing . . . we will be able to actually start editing on the Sony servers using the Avid system on our desks."

Sony BZN-3000 news production software with SXNet technology will control Sony MPEG-2 MAV-1000 video servers working with DSM-series MPEG-2 4:2:2@ML encoders and decoders. SXNet will enable users to move video and audio files between DNE-700 and DNE-1000 nonlinear edit stations and Betacam SX hybrid recorders linked via WAN and ethernet. TXCN will add Betacam SX ClipServer/ClipEdit desktop editing systems when the products are released.

NBC taps Tiernan HDTV encoders

NBC has selected Tiernan HDTV encoders for the delivery of 1080i HDTV programming to its affiliates and owned-and-operated stations. NBC will be using both Tiernan THE-1 and THE-10 modular DTV encoders and TDR6 modular integrated receiver/decoders. The encoders and decoders can be configured to support both HDTV and SDTV programming and can be operated in either satellite or terrestrial networks. In other Tiernan news, ABC affiliate KOMO-TV Seattle has selected Tiernan HDTV encoders and decoders to support its launch of 720P HDTV transmission this fall.

CBS picks Mitsubishi/Tektronix encoders

CBS Corp. has chosen the Mitsubishi/Tektronix line of second-generation HDTV compression products to launch its HDTV service this fall. CBS will use the Mitsubishi/Tektronix MH-1100E encoder for return of contribution programming from CBS Television City in Los Angeles to its New York Broadcast Operations Center. The MH-1100E encoder outputs a 4:2:2 compressed signal at up to 100 Mb/s. In addition, the CBS Television Stations Group will use MH-1100E encoders at four of its O&Os that are scheduled to begin transmitting DTV this November: WCBS-TV New York, WCAU(TV) Philadelphia, KPIX-TV San Francisco and KCBS-TV Los Angeles. The MH-1100EL is a lower-cost 4:2:0 HDTV encoder designed for local terrestrial and satellite broadcasters.

KDFW-DT and WFAA stack up for HDTV

Andrew Corp. has supplied Dallas Fox affiliate KDFW-DT and ABC affiliate WFAA-TV with a TRASAR antenna and support mast for a stacked broadcast DTV transmission system. The new TRASAR traveling-wave, elliptically polarized antenna is side-mounted on a free standing mast with WFAA-TV's new broadcast antenna top-mounted on the same mast. The offset stacked antennas are located at the stations' tower site at Cesar Hill just south of Dallas. According to Barry Cohen, Andrew business unit manager, the offstack antenna configuration helps conserve tower space and provides broadcasters with a way of transmitting HDTV signals on existing tower sites.

AOL builds toward broadband competition

Online service makes content, software, personnel moves

By Richard Tedesco

merica Online struck out in several directions last week with a single goal: to recast itself for the broadband market.

In quick succession, AOL bundled RealNetworks' streaming technology into its latest software, revamped its games channel and raided Time Warner's Road Runner to hire Mario Vecchi as vice president of broadband development. Vecchi had been Road Runner's senior vice president and chief technical officer.

The inclusion of RealPlayer 5.0 in AOL's new 4.0 CD-ROM gives AOL members immediate access to streamed multimedia content. The improved games channel offers AOL users a better-organized, cheaper set of games. Both changes lend themselves to high-speed Internet access services, and the addition of Vecchi clearly indicates AOL's intention of being a serious player in that arena.

"With 13 million consumers served and a growing number of businesses, you can't rule them out as a major force," says Richard Doherty, analyst for The Envisioneering Group. "They're as big as the biggest MSOs, and they're in the territory of the MSOs."

As @Home and Road Runner hagglingly advance the consumer side of their businesses, Doherty sees AOL poised to parlay its brand name into strategic broadband partnerships with MSOs such as MediaOne and Cablevision Systems Corp., which are pushing their own stand-alone high-speed 'Net access services.

"It's a case of whether people in the next several months think this is an @Home/Road Runner world or an @Home/Road Runner/AOL world," says Doherty, who sees Vecchi as AOL's savvy cable insider: "Mario knows how you actually bring these homes and nodes to producing black ink."

AOL's TV strategy is to migrate some of its features to the TV screen, including an electronic program guide and the ability to interact with other AOL users, according to Bob Pittman, AOL's chief operating officer. "We are clearly playing broadband already, but it's not ready for prime time yet," he said last Thursday at a Forrester Research forum held in New York.

AOL reported net income of $7.1 million for its 1998 fiscal fourth quarter last week, compared with a net loss of $11.8 million for the same quarter last year. Net annual income was $91.8 million, against a net loss of nearly $500 million last year. That was on the strength of 3.9 million new members added this year, compared with 2.4 million in '97; commerce and ad revenue that doubled to $439 million, in '98, and service revenue that rose 51%, $2.2 billion.

So AOL would be dealing from a position of relative financial strength in seeking alliances with operators who presumably could improve penetration for their high-speed Net services by packaging AOL's exclusive content with them. And games would fit nicely into that package.

But Seema Williams, an analyst with Forrester Research, says it's unclear how successful AOL's games have been, and she sees the reduced parlor game price as a continued impediment in attracting PC users who can find those games for free elsewhere. "It's a deterrent, but not horribly expensive," she says of the 99-cent-per-hour rate.

AOL's recent acquisition of NetChannel suggests a strategy to build its own AOL TV set-top. AOL has been conducting trials of offering its content via digital subscriber line (DSL) service in an undisclosed number of U.S. cities, with plans to offer a $49.95 package.

But Josh Bernoff, senior analyst at Forrester, sees AOL as ill-prepared for a transition to TV: "They're too rooted in the online world to realize the imperative of what's needed for a TV service."

Sony introduces 'Dawson' desktop

By Richard Tedesco

A s part of a revamp of its Columbia TriStar Television site, Sony is launching an online interactive parallel universe to The WB's Dawson's Creek.

The site will plug PC users into the fictional desktop of the series' lead character, complete with recent e-mails sent and received by aspiring filmmaker Dawson Leery and his favorite Websites. There's also QuickTime video.

In a strategy suggesting the tack NBC took online with its Homicide police drama, some characters introduced through Dawson's Desktop eventually may appear on the show. And series plot lines will be enhanced online, according to Andrew Schneider, director of marketing for Columbia TriStar Interactive: "We don't want to alienate our TV audience, but we want to empower our online audience."

The potential online audience apparently is considerable: Columbia TriStar estimates that there are some 500 unofficial Dawson's Creek sites on the 'Net. It hopes to draw some of those Web visitors (from the show's mostly female 12-18 demographic) to the official site.

In addition to visiting the virtual mind of Dawson on his desktop, fans will be able to chat with series writers who will make occasional appearances in various character "voices."

Columbia expects PC users to spend up to 20 minutes on the site during the first visit and as much as 10 minutes on the daily additions, according to Schneider. It has advertisers lined up for five product categories: autos, music, clothing, software and hardware.

The recast TriStar TV site will include an interactive experience based on its new V.I.P. syndicated series starring Pamela Anderson Lee. PC users will be able to train as operatives in her detective agency, learning techniques for surveillance and for diffusing bombs. They also will have access to video clips.

Comedy Central sales no laughing matter

Brad Samuels is blessed with the job of selling a network that has perhaps the hottest series on cable and is well over the hump of achieving critical mass at a time when other networks are either starving or forking over tens of millions of dollars for carriage.

But Comedy Central’s senior vice president of affiliate sales still faces the huge chore of filling in the remaining gaps in the network’s distribution base. Most large systems have finally added the network—even those of giant Tele-Communications Inc., which had been slow to give carriage in large part because of other disputes with Comedy Central’s 50% partner, Viacom Inc.

Now, armed with his own dedicated sales force for the first time in the network’s six-year existence, Samuels is charged with lifting the network from 54 million subscribers to 70 million.

But instead of expanding at the rate of 100,000, 200,000, or in the case of DBS deals, a million subscribers a clip, Samuels has to make headway 5,000 or 10,000 at a time on smaller systems. A runaway hit like South Park may have cable customers clamoring for the channel in some markets, but getting the room is another issue.

Aiming for that, Comedy Central created its own sales force last year, reclaiming that function from Viacom’s MTV Networks.

“We expect to add 5 or 6 million subs next year, but we still have to find systems,” Samuels says. “That’s pretty challenging when most of the systems are 20,000 subscribers or less.”

Samuels grew up around radio. His father, Perry, spent most of his career in the industry, selling ads for stations in Albany, N.Y., and Washington and eventually winding up as a senior vice president for the radio operations of Cincinnati-based Avco Group. Perry Samuels then bought WLYK (FM), at the time a Cincinnati easy-listening station.

Between college and grad school, Samuels worked at his father’s station for two years, selling ads to local businesses.

“I honestly don’t think he’d have cared if I’d been a plumber,” Samuels says. But he followed his father into the media game, going to Michigan State for a bachelor’s degree in communications and returning for an MA.

His first job was not in radio but in cable, as an affiliate sales account executive for Pro Am Sports, the regional sports network in Detroit. After two years he had job opportunities in two places: MTV Networks’ Chicago affiliate sales office and ESPN’s Bristol, Conn., headquarters.

“I just thought MTV would be a little bit more fun,” Samuels says. He joined in 1986, working for Rich Cronin, who later became general manager of MTV Network’s TV Land and now is president of Fox Family Channel.

After covering Midwest cable systems for seven years, Samuels was tapped by Bob Kreek, who had been named president of Comedy Central. When mounting losses forced MTVN’s Ha! and Home Box Office’s Comedy Channel to merge, both sides agreed that MTVN should handle affiliate sales, building on the clout of its other basic cable networks. MTV and Nickelsodeon. Kreek still wanted an in-house executive to coordinate distribution sales, the most critical challenge for a startup.

MTVN’s affiliate-relations executives sell all the programmer’s products, not a single network. So Samuels was accountable for Comedy Central’s distribution without direct authority over or the full attention of the sales force.

Comedy Central wasn’t complaining too much. MTVN was able to drive Comedy Central into systems and DBS packages serving more than 40 million homes by 1996—well beyond the critical mass point.

Last year was a great one: Comedy Central increased distribution 17%, from 46 million to 54 million. Much of that increase came from deals that already were in place but were accelerated, partly by the success of South Park. Another chunk came from a switch from low-penetration DBS service USSB to DirecTV.

But Comedy Central faces competition for space from dozens of other networks, particularly other midsized networks—like Cartoon Network, Sci-Fi Channel and E!—which also are hammering on those same small systems. Comedy Central isn’t willing to allow operators to add the network on digital tiers, which will have substantially lower penetration than basic.

“If we can keep our rates reasonable, which we intend to do, keep a high-demand channel, which we are, there are still opportunities out there,” Samuels says. “People are rebuilding; people do switch channels out.” Court TV is particularly vulnerable to being replaced because of its cable-basement ratings, he says. —John M. DEATHS

Jeffrey Moss, 56, co-founder of Sesame Street, died of colon cancer Sept. 24 at his home in New York. When he entered the job market in the 1960s, Moss was offered two positions at CBS: one as a writer in the news division, the other as a production assistant on its morning children’s program—Captain Kangaroo. He took the second job. While working on Captain Kangaroo, Moss was recruited by Muppets creator Jim Henson and musical director Joe Raposo to create a PBS television program for children that was enlightening and entertaining: Sesame Street, a huge success. Many of the Muppet characters have had starring roles in other television shows and movies. Moss helped to create the cookie monster and Oscar the Grouch and wrote the “Rubber Duckie” and the “I Love Trash” tunes. He is survived by his wife and two sons.

Sam Locke, 81, writer for radio, television and theater, died Sept. 18 in San Diego. Locke wrote the scripts for such classic radio programs as Grand Central Station and Inner Sanctum. He also wrote sketches for comedians and episodes of such television series as McHale’s Navy, The Lucy Show, and All in the Family. Although he had success in writing for radio, television and entertainers, writing for his first love, the theater, was not as lucrative. One of his plays, “Fair Game,” made it to Broadway. Locke, who was divorced twice, leaves no immediate survivors.

Arnold Walker, 44, press representative, died of complications from pneumonia Sept. 27 in New York. Walker had been a longtime press representative for ABC News’ World News Tonight and for anchor Peter Jennings. He joined ABC News in 1990 after a career in politics; he worked on several congressional and presidential campaigns. Walker is survived by his parents, five siblings and his companion, Nilson Cruz.

Dick Pompa, 55, news anchor, died Sept. 7. Pompa was in Rochester, Mich., attending his brother’s funeral on Thursday, Sept. 3. He had a stroke on Friday and remained in a coma until his death on Monday. For the past 20 years, he had been news anchor and news director at KFBB-TV Great Falls, Mont. Pompa is survived by his wife, Joyce, and four children.

Randy Meg Goldman, 50, producer, director and writer of documentaries, died Sept. 30 at her home in Washington. Goldman won several awards for her documentary, The Holocaust: In Memory of Millions. Other credits include Live From the White House and From Jumpstreet: The Story of Black Music. Goldman also was an editor of The Lawmakers.

CBS President Mel Karmazin said last week his company should be allowed to have a TV outlet in every market and urged the FCC to lift the 35% cap on national audience reach for station owners. "We need to have more places to bring in revenue," he told a group of telecommunications attorneys last week. No, he's not being greedy, he insisted, just trying to compete with cable. "Because of audience fragmentation, networks and stations will become less profitable," he said. Regarding the shift to digital broadcasting, he said CBS-owned stations are on schedule, but he wondered who will be watching. "They probably will be seen only in two Circuit City stores, but we're doing our part." Karmazin lamented that it will take at least five years before there are enough digital TVs in use to determine what type of digital services consumers want. He said four company-owned stations will broadcast digital signals on Nov. 1, 1999, when the FCC requires network affiliates in the top 25 markets to begin offering digital. The markets are New York, Philadelphia, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Martha Stewart will be in the kitchen for a full-hour each day starting next January. Eyemark Entertainment executives have decided to change the daily syndicated series from a half-hour to a one-hour daily format. The series, cleared in more than 93% of the country, already is double-run in nearly 60% of those markets. The weekend edition of Martha Stewart Living will continue to be distributed as a half hour.

The Virginia Supreme Court cleared the way Friday for Michele Finn, wife of former WAVE-TV Louisville anchor Hugh Finn to remove feeding tubes from her husband, who has been in a vegetative state since a 1995 traffic accident. Mrs. Finn had to overcome resistance from some family members and from Virginia Gov. James Gilmore, who appealed a lower court ruling allowing withdrawal of nutrition and fluids.

Viacom's Sumner Redstone is the richest working media and entertainment mogul in the U.S., coming in 15th with $6.4 billion, according to Forbes magazine listing of the 400 richest people in America. News Corp. CEO Rupert Murdoch followed Redstone with $5.6 billion at number 18, edging out his arch-rival Time Warner Vice Chairman Ted Turner with $5 billion at number 19. Cable barons TCI Chairman John Malone and unemployed Amos Hostetter, Continental Cablevision founder, tied for 60th place with $2.5 billion apiece. But even though media and entertainment is booming, it's not enough to overcome the Microsoft billionaires that again topped the list. Also weighing in at number 11 is former Metromedia mogul John Kluge at $9.8 billion.

The radio industry marked its sixth year of consecutive monthly sales increases with a 9% rise in August, according to the Radio Advertising Bureau. Combined local and national advertising revenue climbed for the 72nd straight month. Local August sales jumped 7%, and national sales climbed 16%, compared with August 1997. Through the first eight months of this year, national sales have risen 15%, and local sales are up 10%. Combined figures show an overall increase of 11% this year over the first eight months of 1997. Local sales got their biggest boost in August from the West (15%), the only region with a double-digit increase.

The Secret Diary of Desmond Pfeiffer, the UPN farce set in the Lincoln White House, found itself in the middle of a controversy last week.

UPN was preparing to launch the series despite an unusual resolution passed unanimously by the Los Angeles City Council calling for the show's Oct. 5 debut to be postponed. The council called the sitcom "a bad idea destined to fan the flames of racial discord." The resolution also called on the city's human relations commission to screen the show and review its content.

The show also was the subject of a demonstration last week in Los Angeles by the National Campaign for Advancement of Colored People and the Brotherhood Crusade.

The Washington-based National Campaign for Freedom of Expression attacked the city council resolution, calling it appalling, and UPN Chief Executive Dean Valentine called the measure "an unconscionable and ill-thought-out attack on the First Amendment.”

The resolution was passed last Tuesday (Sept. 29). That was the same day that UPN, in deference to the African-American community, said it was planning to debut the series with an episode other than the pilot episode that had drawn the council's ire. A UPN official said the network did not hear about the council's resolution until after it had decided to move the episode.

The series will debut with the episode entitled "Abe Online," which depicts Lincoln engaging in "telegraph sex."

Still, Valentine disputes the city council's contention that the original premise episode contained "a deplorable lynching scene" cut "only after a protest was staged at the network's headquarters."

For one thing, he said, the scene in question originally "had two dead white men hanging. It had nothing to do with a lynching. Zero. Nothing." For another, the UPN chief said, the issue is moot because he ordered the scene cut two and a half months before last week's protest. The scene was cut not because it offended the sensibilities of African Americans— who, Valentine said, loved the show in focus groups—but because "it was two dead bodies at the beginning of a sitcom. There is no racial insensitivity in the show," he said.

Mark Ridley-Thomas, the sponsor of the Los Angeles City Council bill, said that the resolution wasn't censorship: "Everyone has a right to freedom of expression. That includes council members. I'm not an entertainment watchdog. I'm an elected official trying to raise public concern."

National sales, on the other hand, tailed off in double-digit numbers in all five regions, with the West and Southeast at 19% and the East up 17%.

An amended version of the Children’s Online Privacy Protection Act passed the U.S. Senate Commerce Committee last week. The bill would require solicitors to obtain parental permission before culling personal data from children under age 12. The full Senate considers it next. Meanwhile, the Senate postponed action on the Internet Tax Freedom Act, already passed by the House, which would make the 'Net a free tax zone for three years.

The same day last week that Senate Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) pulled his satellite TV bill from the legislative schedule, House Telecommunications Subcommittee Chairman Billy Tauzin (R-La.) introduced his. Tauzin’s bill would allow satellite TV providers to offer local signals without having to carry every channel during the first three years, or until satellite broadcasters have 15% of the local market, whichever came first. Without Senate action, however, Tauzin’s bill is merely a placeholder for next year, when Congress is likely to pass satellite TV legislation. The law that gov

Back to head Unapix

All American Television chairman and co-founder George Back is leaving the syndication company to run the newly formed Unapix Syndication, New York, a subsidiary of Unapix Entertainment. Back, a 30-year-plus veteran of the syndication business, formed All American in 1982. It was sold to UK-based Pearson last year for $515 million.

Back says he’s been talking with Unapix for a couple of months, although he’s known executives at the company for years. Over the next month or two, he’ll focus on possible new projects to bring to NATPE in January, in addition to a movie package and the 17th Annual Country Showdown special. One possible other project for syndication is Ushia: The Ultimate Adventure, a reality-based adventure series that Unapix produces for CNBC. Back also says that he will be combing the company’s film library for potential new series.

General Instrument Corp. is predicting record results for the third quarter ended Sept. 30. While competitor Scientific-Atlanta expects to take a big hit for the period, GI projects strong improvements in virtually every category: net income up 44%-56%; cash up to $39 million; earnings per share up roughly 24%, to 21 cents per share; operating income up 57%-77%, to as much as $60 million, and revenue up 11.4%, to $518 million. The reason: Strong sales of digital cable systems, including advanced digital set-tops. On the dark side of the economic coin, S-A’s projects earnings per share of 2 cents-5 cents, a huge drop from the 21 cents per share the company earned in the comparable quarter last year and far from the 22 cents that First Call was projecting for this year’s first quarter. In previewing results for its fiscal first quarter, S-A is projecting a 13% drop in revenue, to roughly $257 million. Predictably, S-A’s shares plummeted on the projections, falling $7.5625, or 37%, to $12.8125. The bad news dragged down GI’s shares as well, which fell 6.25 cents, to $19.375. The main culprit for S-A: international markets, where sales fell 54%, to roughly $54 million, because of weakness in demand for S-A’s satellite products. Surprisingly, the Asia-Pacific region wasn’t the weakest sector: Europe and Latin America were. Domestic sales, benefiting from demand for digital cable systems and related products, were up about 13%. But S-A says that, even on the domestic side, it suffered from customer delays in digital rollouts.

The Senate Commerce Committee last week passed a measure that gives low-power TV stations permanent licenses so they won’t lose their licenses once the industry converts to digital. The bill, sponsored by Senator Wendell Ford (D-Ky.), requires LPTV stations to broadcast a minimum of 18 hours each day, with three hours per week of local programming. The bill does not give LPTVs any must-carry rights, according to a Ford aide.

Broadcast news directors have no dog in the fight over industry ownership limits, Barbara Cochran, president of the Radio-Television News Directors Association said last week. "RTNDA has never involved itself as an organization in ownership deregulation and has had no discussion of doing so in the future," she wrote in a letter to FCC Chairman William Kennard. She was responding to comments Kennard made at the group’s annual convention two weeks ago. Kennard complained that the group supported "virtually every ownership deregulation proposal that has come down the pike." Concentration of ownership, he warned, would lead to smaller newsmarket budgets and less diverse newscasts.

In a response to Cochran, Kennard toned down his earlier criticism. "I did not mean to leave the impression that RTNDA had actively taken positions on legislation or regulations where your organization had not." He added, however, that previous RTNDA president David Bartlett once told Columbia Journalism Review that large broadcast organizations could devote more resources to news and public affairs.

Hang together

We share Senator McCain's frustration with last week's collapse of legislation that would have permitted satellite TV companies to offer local broadcast signals. "The lawyers and lobbyists have lawyered and lobbed the satellite and broadcast TV industries into a place that neither industry wants to be," McCain complained.

As we have argued here before, such legislation would benefit all affected businesses. Satellite companies would get the programming viewers want, broadcasters would get another high-quality pathway into homes and cable operators would get a powerful new argument against rate regulation (a fully competitive satellite service).

For a short time, it looked as though the legislation might come together after the NAB said it could live without a must-carry provision for three years. In other words, satellite companies would not have to immediately carry all the broadcast signals in a market. It was a crucial concession. The satellite companies don't have enough capacity to accommodate every station in every market they need to serve. To give them the right to offer local stations tied to the obligation of immediate must carry is to give them nothing.

What ultimately killed the bill was the satellite industry's insistence on expanding the so-called white areas, the fringe areas beyond the reach of local stations where satellite companies may import signals from distant markets. Broadcasters loathed the idea of competing with signals from other markets, particularly those affiliated with the same network. One reason they agreed to local service sans must carry is the expectation that demand for distant signals will abate with the availability of local service. The last thing broadcasters will accept (or should accept) is an enlargement of the distant-signal zone. And lawmakers should reject it too. It undermines localism and condones the widespread cheating that exists under the current regime. Hundreds of thousands of homes are receiving distant signals via satellite even though they are well within the range of local towers.

This legislation is coming back next year. When it does, it will be time for the satellite operators to concede on distant signals as the broadcasters did last week on must carry. If satellite carriers want to get into the business of retransmitting local broadcast signals, they should be prepared to get out of the business of retransmitting distant ones.

Crisis in the White House

The fictional goings-on in the original Lincoln bedroom were the subject of a modern-day controversy last week when UPN's White House farce, The Secret Diary of Desmond Pfeiffer, became the target of an L.A. City Council resolution that "the broadcast of this show to a national audience must be postponed until such time that it is made clear that this show does not trivialize slavery." The council also said that the city's human relations commission should screen the pilot and "conduct a review of the content of the program." While the resolution had no legal force, it was the kind of government bullying, with language like "must postpone," that raises more flags than the signal corps.

UPN has acted more than responsibly. In deference to the African Americans who had concerns about the show, UPN pulled the offending episode for now, replacing it with another that had been scheduled to air later in the season. We've seen that episode—and frankly, the African-American Desmond has more dignity than the other characters, who are broad and obvious lampoons. UPN chief Dean Valentine also points out that a scene in the pilot that particularly disturbed the council already had been cut months ago for reasons of humor—or lack of it—rather than political pressure. Nonetheless, the council stood by its resolution. We think the council should stop trying to tell UPN how to program its network, and we bet UPN will agree not to interfere in municipal decisions.
