Sinclair rattles investors with poor results, Baker exit; Chancellor, with rising costs

By Steve McClellan
and Joe Schlosser

Big trouble in River City? Wall Street thought so last week, as the Sinclair Broadcast Group got hit with a triple-whammy: soft fourth-quarter results, not-so-hot first-half projections and the surprise resignation of Barry Baker as its operating head.

The market, which has savaged Sinclair’s stock over the past 10 months, punished it again last week: At midday Friday, the stock was down 20% for the week, to $13.50.

It was no picnic last week for another TV-radio group, Chancellor Media, as The Street shaved about $9, or 16%, off its share price as well. The issues there: The company more than doubled its earlier projection of capital expenditures (to more than $140 million), and also revealed an additional $20 million in corporate overhead, prompting worries about future cash-flow growth.

“It was a pretty messy week for both of those companies,” said Bill Meyers, broadcast analyst for BancBoston Robertson Stevens, whose downgrade last week of Sinclair helped send the company’s stock price south.

“Losing Barry Baker is a big loss,” says Jessica Reif Cohen, Merrill Lynch’s top entertainment/media analyst. ML also downgraded Sinclair. The company’s fourth-quarter results and near-term outlook—basically flat for TV sales—make the stock a less-than-compelling buy in the near term, Cohen said.

As to the future, Baker says he’s weighing his options—a lot of them. “I’ve had more people who run or own companies call me in the last 72 hours who want me to do something with them,” both inside and outside the TV business. “I want to find something that’s outrageous in terms of the opportunity, and entrepreneurial.”

In 1996, Baker merged his River City Broadcasting (10 TV stations and close to 30 radio stations) with Sinclair in a deal valued at $1.2 billion—creating a 29 station TV Group covering 14% of the U.S. Since the merger, Sinclair has grown to 56 TV stations that cover about 26% of the U.S. and another 51 radio stations spread across 28 states.

Baker is the largest individual Sinclair stockholder outside of the company’s founders, the Smith family, with about 2 million shares that are worth about $6.5 million less now than they were a week ago.

Last week, Baker said he plans to hold on to his Sinclair shares, which traded on Friday at $13.50. Last April, they traded at $30.

Baker has built a reputation in Hollywood and even on Wall Street as a tough, impressive power broker. He also has a reputation as a man with an ego and someone who doesn’t shy away from the limelight.

With such a big station empire, Baker was often the first stop on many of Hollywood’s top syndication executive’s sales trips.

“I’m sorry to see Barry go, because, as big a pain in the ass as he was, we always got things done—and at least we knew how to do business with him,” said one top syndication executive.

Rumors persisted last week about where Baker might end up. One of the more intriguing: working with Barry Diller to integrate Internet powerhouse Lycos into HSN Inc.

As to who might replace Baker, Sinclair Chairman David Smith said last week he’ll look inside the company and out to find a replacement. Other sources say Smith may hire two people to fill Baker’s shoes—a finance type and an operations person. Bill Butler, the company’s top programmer, is expected to remain in place.

Smith said he will temporarily step into an operational role at Baltimore-based Sinclair, but only until he finds a replacement for Baker. As to the company’s recent and near-term performance, Smith replied, “We’re in a cyclical business, where there are up quarters and down quarters. It’s just a series of averages.”

He acknowledged that cable competition “makes the business that much harder in the near term.” He also said that the national spot business for TV stations, which has been weak in recent quarters, will probably disappear in a few years, making TV, like radio, a business driven by the local economy. Picking up the slack will be businesses stemming from digital, he said.
As to Dallas-based Chancellor, Wall Street also had concerns about management's ability to integrate the pieces yet to be acquired—LIN TV, Capstar and Petry Media, an advertising rep firm. "I think investors are saying 'show me you can do it and how you can do it,'" said Meyers.

Several analysts last week said Chancellor's situation is somewhat bizarre, given the company's announced intention to sell off some, possibly all of its media assets—even before it has closed on all of its proposed acquisitions.

When those deals close, Chancellor will own 465 radio stations and 13 television stations.

Last week, Chancellor chief executive officer Jeff Marcus told analysts the company has brought in several more of Wall Street's heaviest hitters, including Morgan Stanley, Goldman Sachs, Chase Securities, Greenhill Partners and Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst (which controls Chancellor) to advise it on "strategic alternatives." BT Alex Brown, the first banker brought in, in January, and Morgan Stanley, will spearhead the effort, said Marcus.

"That whole situation is very bizarre," says one analyst at a major Wall Street firm. Meyers says the move is more premature than strange. He notes that Hicks Muse and Chancellor began pursuing strategic alternatives because Chancellor's stock was trading at a discounted value compared to competitors, including Infinity and Clear Channel.

But, says Meyers, Chancellor should trade at a discount because of its debt—which now totals more than $4 billion, compared to virtually debt-free Infinity—while Clear Channel has a debt-to-cash-flow ratio of about half of Chancellor's.

"If they just execute the integration plan and achieve the organic growth they said they would, their debt ratio would decline and so would the discount," he said.

Indeed, Meyers and other analysts last week conceded that Chancellor's fourth-quarter operating numbers were quote good, with 15% pro forma revenue growth and a 24% gain in broadcast cash flow.

One major investor in the Chancellor holdings said the company's fundamentals were sound. "The stock is more volatile than any media stock I'm aware of for reasons I'm not quite sure of," the investor said. "The lower it goes, the more likely it will be sold, because it will be affordable to someone like Clear Channel or Disney."

Chancellor's Marcus told Broadcasting & Cable last week, "The business is exceedingly sound and we anticipate that will continue into 1999."

As to a possible sale of the company, Marcus said, "we're in the early days of the process. We're pleased by the interest in the company, though that doesn't come as a surprise."

But as to any actual deal, he said, "It's like fishing. We have no idea when the fish are going to bite."

The group had an 18% drop in cash flow, to $175 million on revenues that were 10% higher, at $1.05 billion. For the quarter, sources say Fox incurred $25 million to $30 million in costs on the World Series that featured a quick New York Yankees Series sweep over the San Diego Padres.

The box office success of Titanic helped Fox Entertainment Group offset losses at the Fox television ranks in the fourth quarter.

Fox Entertainment Group posted a 52% jump in profit, to $105 million, and parent company News. Corp. kept its net profit flat at $395 million, according to results announced last week.

Fox CFO David Devoe said he expects the network to turn a profit in the upcoming March and June quarters with solid prime time ratings.

At the 22 Fox owned-and-operated stations, operating results were up over the same three quarters of 1997, but only marginally, according to Fox Entertainment President Peter Chernin. Chernin blamed results a rough advertising environment.

Songs in key of LMA restriction

Even wealthy single-station owners have difficulty competing, Wonder tells FCC

By Bill McConnell

The FCC’s Democratic majority indicated last week that it is determined to place new restrictions on TV local marketing agreements and in-market radio/TV crossownership.

Chairman William Kennard and his Democratic colleagues also got a little support from music superstar Stevie Wonder, who testified about ownership rules at a Feb. 12 hearing, joining industry officials, academics, and public-interest advocates.

Wonder, who owns KJLH-FM Los Angeles, said that single-station owners, even wealthy ones like himself, have had increasing difficulty competing since the 1996 Telecommunications Act removed the cap on radio station ownership.

“It’s difficult, if not impossible for a single-station owner to compete against conglomerates,” Wonder said. “If independent stations disappear, communities across the country will lose broadcasters with strong local ties, he said. “Our business decisions are not dictated by the Dow Jones but by Mary Jones, who relies on our station for information about the community.”

Despite increased pressure from lawmakers and industry to relax rules, the three Democratic commissioners demonstrated that they still hold deep reservations about increasing broadcast ownership concentration.

Commissioner Susan Ness argued that a possible alternative to the ban on TV duopolies would be to permit waivers for stations that make a firm commitment to offering news, children’s programming and public service announcements not already available in a community.

Kennard was critical of industry panelists who suggested that the FCC should leave ownership oversight to the Justice Department. “I’m having difficulty seeing how antitrust laws will be a panacea,” he said.

Not all industry officials supported looser rules, though. Alan Frank, general manager of Post-Newsweek station WDIV-TV Detroit, called for the elimination of LMAs, which allow one station to control another in the same market and circumvent the ban on TV duopolies. He called for tight grandfathering rules that force nearly all in-market LMAs to be divested in a few years.

Media Access Project President Andrew Schwartzman called on the FCC to establish waivers that would allow TV duopolies when a station promises to air a set amount of locally produced programming.

Schwartzman said the commission should not be swayed by complaints from lawmakers, who want all LMAs and in-market radio-TV deals to be grandfathered permanently. “You are an independent regulatory commission with delegated authority and charged with interpreting the law,” he told the commissioners.

Last week, House Commerce Committee Chairman Tom Bliley (R-Va.), Senate Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) and three other lawmakers asked the FCC to permanently grandfather all TV LMAs and eliminate the ban on in-market radio/TV combinations.

Clear Channel, Jacor spin-offs
To speed merger, companies encouraging minorities to purchase radio stations

By Elizabeth A. Rathbun

In what company Chairman L. Lowry Mays says is an effort to encourage minority ownership of radio stations, Clear Channel Communications Inc. is spinning off nine FMs and AMs to minority owners.

They are African American-owned Radio One Inc. and Blue Chip Broadcasting Co., and Hispanic-owned Mega Communications Inc. The spin-offs are part of $320 million in deals involving 20 radio stations being sold or swapped to help comply with FCC overlap rules.

Other buyers are Infinity Broadcasting Corp., Cox Radio Inc. and ABC Radio. An AM and FM in Jacksonville, Fla., were put in trust pending an acceptable deal.

At a glance
The spin-offs from the pending merger of Clear Channel and Jacor break down this way. The deals require FCC approval.

Radio One acquires an AM-FM combo in Cleveland from Clear Channel.

Blue Chip gets two FMs and one AM in Louisville, Ky., from Jacor and two FMs and one AM in Dayton, Ohio, from Clear Channel.

Mega adds one FM, in Tampa, Fla., from Clear Channel.

In Tampa, Cox gets two FMs from Clear Channel and the license for WTET-FM and format of WOUV-FM from Jacor (which Clear Channel/Jacor count as the equivalent of one station). In Louisville, Cox will assume two FMs from Jacor and hold an option to buy WMHX-FM Louisville. In exchange, Cox will pay an undisclosed amount of cash and swap to Clear Channel/Jacor three FMs and two AMs in Syracuse, N.Y., where they currently lack a presence.

Also in Tampa, Clear Channel will spin off two FMs to Infinity and one AM to ABC.

Infinity gets another FM, in Cleveland, from Clear Channel. Infinity says it will pay $122.5 million cash for its three stations.

That accounts for all the stations that Clear Channel has to divest under its pending $4.4 billion merger with Jacor Communications Inc., says Chief Financial Officer Randall Mays.

"We made a very conscious effort to find minority owners because we think there is a lack of minority-owned broadcasting properties," Lowry Mays says.

It doesn’t hurt at the FCC either, which has been pushing broadcasters to make such efforts.

Clear Channel will not retain a stake in any of the minority companies.

The deals add up to $285 million cash and $55 million in swaps, though prices for all individual deals were not disclosed.

Meanwhile, Cox says it will divest two of its FMs in Louisville, Ky., leaving it a total of four FMs there. It claims six FMs and one AM in Tampa, Fla., despite FCC rules that limit broadcasters to no more than five stations from one band per market.

Meanwhile, Clear Channel is in deep negotiations to acquire Chancellor Media Corp., which has put its 465 radio stations and other holdings on the block.

Assuming the spin-off deals close, Clear Channel/Jacor would own or operate 470 radio stations in 107 markets, along with 22 TV stations and more than 274,000 outdoor advertising faces.

Kids upfront set for March, April
Heavy supply expected to keep take close to $750 million

By Steve McClellan

A flat kids’ upfront sales market will probably take place in late March or early April. Advertising executives say that with consolidation among major toy makers, it’s a buyer’s market, much like last season. More competition than ever in the children’s programming business and lower levels of viewership this season were also cited as factors.

“There may be some new money for small categories, but I can’t see any of the major categories being up,” said Julie Friedlander, head of national broadcast buying for Ogilvy & Mather.

When asked about the timing of this year’s market at the Fox Family-Fox Kids upfront presentation in New York last week, Rick Sirvaitis, president, advertising sales, Fox Family Worldwide, agreed. Spending by advertisers in the kids’ market will be flat, or “comparable to last year,” he said.

However some sales executives counter that demand for kids’ advertising will be stronger and believe the market may grow about 5%. Last year’s market was down about 7%, to $750 million.

In prior years, the kids’ upfront broke in February, right after the Toy Fair in New York. Last year the market broke late because key clients didn’t have budget plans in place. This year, too, advertisers aren’t ready to hurry to market. “Why rush?” says one agency source.

“Given the number of rating points cable has added to the market, it makes less sense for the market to go earlier,” says Friedlander. “The market kept getting earlier for no reason. That just makes budgets less reliable, especially for the toy companies. People were making announcements in early January. The toy companies aren’t done analyzing Christmas by then. We’ve just returned to what the old timing was. And I think it will stay that way.”

Nielsen ratings show an overall 8% decline in kids’ TV viewing Monday
Hindery acknowledged Friday that company's investors will be managed. The decline, he said, may be a result of increased computer usage, as well as "methodological issues with Nielsen." Those issues have to do with whether or not kids, especially younger ones, are registering properly with people meters.

On Saturday morning, kids' ratings are down 13% on the four broadcast networks combined. During the fourth quarter among kids 2 to 11, Fox's Saturday morning slate was down 21%; WB was down 23%; and ABC was down 11%. NBC, which targets older kids and teens, was down 12%.

Nickelodeon, the ratings leader on Saturday mornings, was flat with a 3.7 rating among kids 2-11. CBS, which revamped its Saturday slate almost entirely this season, was up 20%, to a 0.8 rating, which kept it in last place, well behind most of the pack.

During the week, the two-hour Fox Kids Network after-midnight block is down 11% in rating this season, to a 2.2/13. The competing WB kids' block is down 29% (four-tenths of a rating point) to a 1.0/7. WB Kids had planned a February unveiling of its new season schedule, but has put it off to March after assessing the market.

Sources also say the WB has two midseason shows it wants to let settle in—Batman Beyond and Pokemon—and hopefully have a good ratings story to tell advertisers in March.

Nick is also down during the 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. time period this year, by about 11%, to 2.5/17. Fox Family daytime kids' slate is averaging a .4/1 in the time period, which amounts to 141,000 kids on average. Last year, the network didn't target kids in the time period.

One possible snag is that TCI could still be awaiting approval from half a dozen cities at the time AT&T targeted takeover of the MSO. The MSO needs approval from 967 cities, counties or states to sell itself to AT&T. Twenty-three have yet to complete their approvals, but most of those are well on their way as AT&T tries to close the deal by the end of March.

But TCI company executives are pessimistic about their prospects for approval of six franchise transfers, including Portland and Multnomah County, Ore. Those cities are pushing AT&T to "unbundle" its high-speed Internet pipe from the At Home service, allowing other Internet service providers to offer Web access. The big question is whether the telco will go ahead and close on the $50 billion takeover, or delay it.

Closing without approval gives already-testy government officials the legal opportunity of revoking the franchise. But AT&T could try and smooth things over afterward. "We would like to have those approvals done," said an AT&T spokeswoman. But she would not say what the company would do if all transfers weren't completed.

TCI, AT&T prep for vote on deal

In $50 billion merger, Hindery prevails as company's management takes shape

By John M. Higgins

As shareholders of Tele-Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp. vote on the two companies' $50 billion merger this week, AT&T hammered out details of how the operations will be managed.

But the telco is still far from nailing down all the government approvals needed to fully complete the deal.

The shareholder vote itself is anticlimactic. TCI Chairman John Malone controls a majority of TCI's shareholders' votes and has pledged to support it, so it doesn't matter what other investors do. There's no similar concentration of votes at AT&T, but the company's 50% stock price increase has erased Wall Street's initial anxiety over whether the deal would get done.

On the management side, AT&T acknowledged Friday that it was shuffling its planned management structure. The plan called for TCI president Leo Hindery to run the post-takeover cable system operation, to be named AT&T Broadband Service, but report up through vice chairman John Zeglis. Hindery will now work directly with AT&T chairman Mike Armstrong. Zeglis will continue to run the consumer side of AT&T's long distance phone division and will add oversight of AT&T's international operations and investments.

Industry executives had privately said for months that Hindery was pushing for a new structure and was refusing to report to Zeglis as laid out in last June's initial announcement of the TCI sale. AT&T denied that and very publicly restated the old structure in January when it sent a proxy statement to both companies' shareholders.

Armstrong plans to shift his own role as well. After spending his first year at the company on a flurry of major deals and a cost-cutting campaign, he plans to focus more on operations and executing some of the plans he's engineered by the multibillion dollar acquisitions of TCI and competitive local phone carrier Teleport Communications Group Inc.

One possible snag is that TCI could still be awaiting approval from half a dozen cities at the time AT&T targeted takeover of the MSO. The MSO needs approval from 967 cities, counties or states to sell itself to AT&T. Twenty-three have yet to complete their approvals, but most of those are well on their way as AT&T tries to close the deal by the end of March.

But TCI company executives are pessimistic about their prospects for approval of six franchise transfers, including Portland and Multnomah County, Ore. Closing without approval gives already-testy government officials the legal opportunity of revoking the franchise. But AT&T could try and smooth things over afterward. "We would like to have those approvals done," said an AT&T spokeswoman. But she would not say what the company would do if all transfers weren't completed.

The Cartoon Network is up 3 share points and four-tenths of a rating to a 1.1/7 in the time period. Its rating was no doubt helped by a boost, to 8 million, in household penetration this season.

For the first time, Fox will have a unified ad sales pitch across all its kids' media outlets, overseen by Sirvaitis. Those outlets include the cable and broadcast networks, two digital cable networks (one for boys and one for girls) that debut next October, a radio network, a magazine and various Web sites, which will have upfront advertising availabilities for the first time. The Web sites include foxkids.com; foxfamilychannel.com; boyzchannel.com and girlzchannel.com. Fox unveiled 19 news series for Fox Kids and Fox Family next season.

Scheduling of the shows will be announced later, said Maureen Smith, executive vice president, Fox Family Worldwide.
ABC, NBC weigh joining OpenNet

Concerned about video streaming, networks may align with unbundling lobbying group

By Bill McConnell

N

ABC and NBC may be entering the ranks of those fighting for government rules that would force cable companies to open their broadband networks to Internet competitors.

The two broadcast networks are considering joining OpenNet, a new coalition formed by America Online, US West and other companies seeking to force cable operators to "unbundle" their high-speed networks.

"We're also in discussions with the music and movie industries," notes Greg Simon, OpenNet's co-director. "This issue is not dead."

Though officials at the two networks say they haven't decided whether they will join the group, the two are particularly concerned that cable companies will prevent them from using "streaming" technology to offer full-length movies over the Internet.

The FCC, as early as this week, is expected to approve the merger of AT&T Corp. and Tele-Communications Inc.—without the unbundling rules requested by AOL. Two weeks ago AT&T also signed a deal with Time Warner to offer local telephone service over that company's broadband network.

Network officials worry that cable companies, whose high-speed networks are as much as 100 times faster than Internet service over traditional phone lines, will eventually dominate the Internet and exercise too much control over the content customers can access.

The networks run their own Internet portals, or access sites. In June NBC struck a deal with Internet content provider Cnet to create its portal, Snap! Disney, ABC's parent company, has rechristened its Internet portal the Go Network (it had been Infoseek).

"We can't allow Time Warner or AT&T to discriminate against other Internet portals," says Robert Okun, lobbyist for NBC. "If you're Time Warner, all you want is to have your own portal utilized."

Although the FCC has dropped the unbundling issue for now, Chairman William Kennard promises to re-examine it if cable companies succeed in controlling high-speed services.

Kennard has said video streaming is one potential hot spot. At a hearing in October, he expressed concern over contracts between TCI and At Home, the cable company's Internet partner, that prevent streaming of more than 10 minutes of video. AT&T officials say the restrictions are necessary to prevent At Home from eating up their network's capacity. They also promise that video and other content providers will be able to negotiate individual deals to get their services carried on the high-speed network.

Several candidates are lining up for the job of director of the National Telecommunications Information Administration, a post currently held by Larry Irving.

In the running, sources say, are private-sector lobbyist Mark MacCarthy, Senate staffer Greg Rohde and Florida Public Service Commissioner Julia Johnson. Irving has not announced any plans to leave, although sources say that he has privately mulled departing. Therefore, the administration wants to be prepared when and if he resigns, so that his position will be filled quickly.

The NTIA advises the administration on domestic and international telecommunications issues, including spectrum management, cable rates and digital broadcasting. The NTIA is part of the executive branch, while the FCC is an independent agency.

MacCarthy is a principal with Washington lobbying firm The Wexler Group, where he's been ensconced since December 1994. Prior to that, he was a lobbyist with ABC Inc., beginning in 1988. He came to ABC after working on the House Commerce Committee from 1981 to 1988 as a top staffer for Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.).

Rohde, a native South Dakotan, serves as Senator Byron Dorgan's legislative assistant, handling such issues as telecommunications and transportation. Dorgan (D-N.D.) is a member of the Senate Commerce Committee and assistant minority floor leader.

Johnson is serving her second four-year term on the Florida Public Service Commission, which regulates Florida utility rates. She chaired the commission during the past two years. Prior to her appointment, she was legislative affairs director for the Department of Community Affairs, where she lobbied for the agency on economic development, land-use growth management, energy efficiency, housing and emergency management. From 1990 to 1991, she was a senior attorney at DCA and from 1988 to 1990, she was an associate with the Orlando, Fla. law firm of Maguire, Voorhis and Wells.

Irving has headed NTIA throughout both terms of the Clinton administration. He came to Washington in 1979 after graduating from Stanford Law School, where he was president of his class. He worked at the law firm of Hogan & Hartson from 1979 to 1983 and then went up to Capitol Hill as the legislative director and counsel to Rep. Mickey Leland (D-Texas), a member of the Congressional Black Caucus from 1983 to 1987. He was the senior counsel on mass media for the House Telecommunications Subcommittee from 1987 to 1992 and moved to the Department of Commerce in 1993.

Tauzin hits FCC over microradio

By Elizabeth A. Rathbun

Saying "I have never been so offended by an agency of government" except perhaps the IRS, House Telecommunications Subcommittee Chairman Billy Tauzin blasted the FCC's new microradio proposal.

He took the agency to task for issuing the plan without first consulting Congress.

In a letter to FCC Chairman William Kennard and during a luncheon address before radio group owners gathered last Thursday, Tauzin (R-La.) asked Kennard to appear before his subcommittee to address members' concerns. "In the meantime I request that you take no further actions on this agenda," his letter said.

Kennard is pushing microradio as a way to get minorities, women, neighborhood and church organizations and small businesses onto the air. His plan, presented last month for comment, would allow the licensing of 1,000-watt and 100-watt FM stations with service areas of 8.8 miles and 3.5 miles, respectively.

"I'm sure that Chairman Tauzin does not want to limit Americans' choices to who or what they can hear on the radio," Kennard responded. "There is room enough for the voices of churches, schools and neighborhood groups, as well as established radio companies."

Public broadcasting already fills that need, Tauzin said, adding that he fears microradio would be filled by the rhetoric of "skinheads" and other fringe groups. "Suppose you have a bad message," Tauzin said. "Do we create a special spectrum use for those kind of voices? I don't think we should."

The National Association of Broadcasters and members of the broadcast industry have vehemently denounced the microradio plan. Their arguments generally revolve around possible interference problems with their stations and potential loss of advertisers.

Black heading to Lifetime

Sources say KNBC-TV Los Angeles General Manager Carole Black will become the new president of Lifetime. The announcement is expected this week. Black and Lifetime executives were expected to negotiate through the weekend to come to final terms on the agreement. The post has been vacant since Doug McCormick resigned in December. Black had apparently been debating the move to the colder climate of New York, where Lifetime is based. She has been general manager at the NBC station since 1994 and was formerly a senior marketing executive at Walt Disney Studios. (Disney is a 50/50 partner with Hearst Entertainment in Lifetime). Neither Black nor Lifetime executives would comment.

'Overconsolidation' warning issued

Radio "overconsolidation" will be a topic of discussion as House Telecommunications Subcommittee Chairman Billy Tauzin decides how he wants to overhaul the FCC. In comments to radio group heads gathered last Thursday near Washington, Tauzin (R-La.) said he has heard concerns about the fact that some radio groups have been snapping up hundreds of radio stations. That creates "a market problem in some communities," with smaller stations finding it harder to win advertising dollars from the mega-clusters that have developed, he said after a speech sponsored by the National Association of Broadcasters. But the issue won't be legislated, he said. "I don't think that we have much control over that," he said, adding that consolidation is more appropriately an issue for the Justice Department. Tauzin said he will announce his plans for the FCC overhaul next month, with a bill to be introduced this summer.

Face time

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain (R-Ariz.) last week assured executives from 60 ABC affiliates that he has two priorities for his satellite TV reform bill: create competition to cable and make sure consumers are connected to their local stations in order to get local news. McCain's words relieved ABC affiliates, who are opposed to a provision in his bill that would allow satellite TV subscribers to continue receiving illegal distant network signals if broadcasters cannot prove that the service hurts their business. McCain plans a hearing on the issue Feb. 23.

The affiliates also visited House Telecommunications Subcommittee Chairman Billy Tauzin (R-La.), who bashed the FCC and its microradio plan. Tauzin spent a lot of quality time with broadcasters. Last Friday (Feb. 12), he had breakfast in New York with ABC President Bob Iger and other ABC executives, and then spent the rest of the day meeting with NBC executives, minus President Bob Wright, at Rockefeller Center. Tauzin discussed broadcast ownership, satellite TV reform, digital must carry and FCC reform, said Ken Johnson, Tauzin's spokesman. Tauzin plans to host a hearing on satellite TV reform on Feb. 24 and late next month to introduce a satellite TV reform bill.

Puzzling comment

Andrew Schwartzman might want to leave the newspaper at home the next time he's asked to testify at an FCC hearing. The Media Access Project president was either multi-tasking or had tuned out fellow panelists during a hearing on broadcast ownership rules when Commissioner Harold Furchtgott-Roth encouraged him to focus on the business at hand. "I believe the answer to nine down is 'attention,'" Roth blurted to the red-faced Schwartzman, who had been working on The New York Times crossword puzzle.

Armstrong pledges ‘no redlining’

AT&T chief says broadband cable networks will not neglect poorer neighborhoods

By Bill McConnell

A

T&T Chairman Michael Armstrong said last week that his company won’t shun poor or rural neighborhoods when rolling out broadband cable networks. “You will not see this company, or anything this company has to do with, be involved in any ‘redlining,’” (a common banking term for neglecting poorer neighborhoods) he told the National Press Club.

AT&T is expected to get FCC approval to merge with cable giant Tele-Communications Inc. in the next few weeks. Regulators and consumer advocates want Armstrong to set a tight timetable for introducing Internet and local telephone services to “hard to serve” rural and low-income communities before the deal is approved.

But Armstrong, the former head of DirecTV parent Hughes Electronics Co., said there is no reason for regulators to worry that AT&T will ignore isolated or less-affluent customers. “There is zero correlation between entertainment consumption and income level,” he said. “Everyplace you go, no matter what the neighborhood looks like, you find a color TV set, and probably with a cable going into it. It’s not good business to do something like redlining.”

Armstrong also said AT&T wants to add more cable deals to bolster its local telephone market reach. With the acquisition of TCI and a deal with Time Warner, the company will pass 43% of American homes. He wants to reach as many as 70% of homes through additional agreements with cable companies and will try to offer service to the rest of the country through fixed wireless service or telephone lines leased from Bell operators.

Noting that last week marked the third anniversary of the 1996 Telecommunications Act, Armstrong praised the law for making his push into the cable market possible. He blamed local telephone companies for failing to open their markets to competition and called on the FCC to force them to cut the access fees they charge long-distance and competing carriers. He also predicted that the FCC will not force cable companies to open their broadband networks to Internet competitors, now or in the future. Last week, Chairman William Kennard said AT&T’s merger with TCI would not be contingent on such unbundling.

But Roy Neel, president of the U.S. Telephone Association, called the act a failure because regulators still restrict regional Bell phone companies from entering the long-distance market and from acquiring cable companies.

“We’re not allowed to be the same businesses they are in,” Neel complained. “If we were, there wouldn’t be this debate over access to AT&T’s broadband pipe.” He called on lawmakers to re-examine major provisions of the law.

But administration officials, in several speeches commemorating the anniversary of the law’s enactment, said there is no chance the law would be revisited.

“This is one of the most pro-competitive pieces of legislation passed by Congress in a generation,” said Commerce Secretary William Daley. He also said the administration is content to allow regulation of upper-tier cable rates to expire March 31 as required by the law.

Alert-system fee rules industry

Broadcasters upset with paying royalty on bad weather alert system mandated by FCC

by Paige Albinak

roadcasters are balking at a request that they pay royalty fees on technology included in the Emergency Alert System the FCC requires them to use.

Last December, Quad Dimension Inc. of Kansas City, Mo., began sending broadcasters letters asking that they pay $15 per month, or $1,495 for the life of the patent, to use QDI technology engineered into the Emergency Alert System. That technology automatically broadcasts bad-weather alerts through local radio and TV stations.

QDI first applied for a patent on the technology in February 1991, which the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office approved in June 1992. QDI then began asking equipment manufacturers that were using the technology to pay royalties, which prompted them to complain to the Commerce Department. At equipment manufacturers’ requests, the Patent Office took another look at QDI’s patent. The Patent Office reconfirmed QDI’s patent in September 1998.

After that, QDI felt its claims were validated and began sending out letters to broadcasters, which quickly brought broadcasters complaining to the FCC and the National Weather Service.

“Time is increasingly of the essence here,” wrote NAB President Eddie Fritts to FCC Chairman William Kennard and NWS Director John Kelly. “Broadcasters are innocently caught between two conflicting federal pressures—compliance with the patent laws and adherence to FCC regulations. We urge your agencies to work together swiftly to achieve a solution that will insulate broadcasters from liability, avoid unjust private enrichment but also ensure prompt and accurate relay of emergency information to the public.”

The FCC in November 1994 required broadcasters to switch from the Emergency Broadcast System to the Emergency Alert System, which the FCC believed was based on technology developed by the NWS, not by a private company. Broadcasters then purchased,
Rainbow/PUSHing for Low Power

Jesse Jackson, head of the Rainbow/PUSH coalition, last week endorsed the FCC's plan to create a new class of low-power stations on the FM dial. "It is critical that our policymakers continue to provide new opportunities for community-based radio broadcasting," Jackson said. "Diversity and equal access to information is in the spirit of a true democracy." Being careful not to step on the toes of existing broadcasters, Jackson added that microradio should not be allowed to create interference with the digital radio service the industry is developing. "We do not want to limit future advances in radio," he said.

We want our free TV airtime

TV networks should be required to devote more airtime to political coverage, a citizen's group said last week. Networks "are abdicating their responsibility for coverage of politics and public affairs," said Curtis B. Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, in a report released Feb. 9. "Perhaps it is time to hold hearings on the networks' political coverage...with an eye to establishing some guidelines or regulations so that the public will be properly and accurately informed." Gans complained that the networks have cut election night coverage to one hour during prime time and have ceded thorough coverage of election returns to CNN and the Internet. Despite the competitive inroads made by cable, the diminished network coverage robs the 50% of American viewers who still rely on the networks for their news of crucial election coverage, Gans said.

Cox clan to take home award

The Cox family will receive the National Association of Broadcasters' 1999 Distinguished Service Award. Cox Enterprises Chairman and CEO James Kennedy will accept the award on Monday, April 19, at NAB '99 in Las Vegas. Three-term Ohio governor James M. Cox founded Cox Enterprises more than 100 years ago when he purchased a newspaper in Ohio. In 1934, Cox established WWHO(AM) Dayton, Ohio, the first radio station in Ohio's Miami Valley. He started radio station WWHO-AM Atlanta in 1939, which was one of the first radio stations in the Southeast. In 1948, Cox started some of the nation's first TV stations with WHO-TV Dayton and WSB-TV Atlanta. Fifty years later, WSB-TV was the first in Georgia to go on the air with digital broadcasting.

Licht moves up

Renee Licht, deputy chief of the FCC's Mass Media bureau since 1994, has been named deputy managing director of the Office of Managing Director. Licht also has served as deputy general counsel and adviser to several commissioners. Charles "Buck" Logan, chief of the Mass Media Bureau's policy and rules division, will be the bureau's acting deputy. In her new post, Licht will oversee the commission's reorganization efforts. The commission is currently consolidating into two divisions, the enforcement and public information offices that have been spread across the agency's various bureaus.

Comsat's New Price

The FCC last week ordered Comsat to cut rates for access to the Intelsat system. Occasional users of Intelsat's video transmission services will get a one-time 4% reduction. Annual rate cuts were implemented for switched-voice and capped for private-line services. The pricing changes are part of the FCC's switch to "incentive-based" rate regulation, which forces Comsat to maintain profit margins through efficiency gains. The price changes mirror recent average rate changes in comparable telecommunication industry sectors. Previously rates for the affected Comsat services were fixed to allow a set rate of return.

PBS restructures

In a nod to corporate catch phrases, PBS last week changed its advertising, promotion and corporate communications department into the "communications and brand management" department, said Carole Feld, PBS senior vice president. The new department will be divided into three groups: strategy and brand management, which will develop strategies and create materials to promote PBS programs and strengthen PBS brand awareness; communications, which handles the media and PBS's public image, and account services, which will manage customer relations; Judy Braune will take over the first group as vice president of strategy and brand management; Tom Epstein continues as vice president in charge of communications and Marcia Brooks, senior director of account services, will head that department.

About a year ago, when major syndicators started thinking about the future of their barter advertising trade association—the Advertiser Syndicated Television Association—they reached several conclusions. First, it was clear they'd have to invest more in the organization if it were to be effective in helping to grow the barter share of ad dollars. The syndicators also concluded that to communicate more effectively with the advertising community the trade group needed a leader who spoke the same language as advertisers—someone who knew the business inside and out. Enter Allison Bodenmann, an advertising executive with 20 years' experience, who spent the last 10 as senior vice president and broadcast director at Jordan, McGrath, Case & Partners.

Last summer, she was selected to be president of the rechristened Syndicated Network Television Association. At that time, two studio-owned syndicators that had shunned the trade group—Columbia TriStar Television Distribution and Paramount Domestic Television Distribution—signed on, giving Bodenmann additional clout and money with which to work. (Of the major syndicators, only King World chooses not to be a member). In the following interview with Broadcasting & Cable Deputy Editor Steve McClellan, Bodenmann talks about her goals. Job one, of course, is to convince more advertisers to spend more money in syndication, now roughly a $2.5 billion annual business. Bodenmann also discusses developing trends in syndications, new opportunities, growth projections and more.
How is the new SNTA different from the old ASTA?
There's a stronger commitment from the membership to really get out and talk to people who we really haven't talked to before. Or haven't been successful with before. There are a lot of categories that advertise in different national mediums that don't use syndication at all. And some of those categories don't make a lot of sense for syndication and some of them make a lot of sense. So the ones that make a lot of sense, we're sort of focused on going and talking to.

Why you?
My background primarily. As an ex-agency person, I'm used to talking to advertisers, marketers and ad agencies. Those are the people the sales side needs to reach. And there are issues that the industry has with the way [the syndicators] do business and we're working that out as well.

What issues?
I think a lot of agency complaints come in the form of you negotiate with us on ratings estimates and you think new shows will do a 12 and they do a 6. We're working to help people [on the sales side] understand why that's not a good way to do business. Everybody does it, but there are certain cases where it is worse. When you don't have 24 hours of inventory to make up the differences, it makes it harder to do it that way. Some agencies have figured a way to deal with it and some haven't. We're working with those who haven't to help them do that.

Who are the light users or nonusers of syndication that you're going after?
None of the credit card companies really use much syndication. The automotive category really doesn't use syndication. Fast food and soft drinks are not big in syndication, and for the kind of targeted programming we have it makes sense for them to be there. So that's just a handful there, but that's a lot of advertising.

Why aren't they in syndication?
There's so much changing in this business, and people tend to think of syndication as the way it used to be—that's there's not programming out there that suits my adult target. Or they think of syndication as talk shows and game shows. But in the last few years there's been a real dramatic change in the kind of programming in syndication. One major change is the big increase in off-network programming.

You started as a buyer in this business 20 years ago. What's been the biggest change in syndication?
Then there were a half-dozen first-run shows and they were all skewed to women. The package goods companies bought them, but no one else did. That's changed. There's a much greater diversity of syndication programming now than there was then. And the whole landscape has changed with the way people watch television—with the clicker—so stations don't really matter. It's the programming that drives viewers to TV and they'll find it whatever time it's running if it's something they want to see.

What else has changed?
Fragmentation is a big issue. It used to be you bought network because you got a 20 rating and you bought cable because you got a lot of frequency. But the ratings gaps aren't that dramatic any more. I mean, there were a couple of times this summer when the X-Files in syndication did better than the X-Files on Fox. Same with The Simpsons.

What's it going to take to get advertisers to pay prices in syndication that are at parity with the networks, on a cost-per-thousand basis?
I don't know that it will ever have parity with the networks. If you're doing the right thing in advertising you need to be everywhere. You can't just focus on network. There are roughly 50 choices of things to watch [for the average viewer] and people still only watch 12. But those 12 vary by viewers. So you have to look at a little bit of everything to reach the television audience these days. Ten years ago you didn't have to do that.

Have you lured any new advertisers yet?
We are just starting to talk to new people. We started this organization in October. It took us a while to get the office set up and then we've been working on a presentation to take out. Now that the [National Association of Television Program Executives conference] is over, we'll pretty much hit the road and start talking to people.

What did you learn at NATPE this year?
I met a lot of people I need to go visit. Although a lot of people that attend NATPE are already supporters of syndication, there are a fair amount who are just kind of looking and thinking about it.

How many advertising execs were at the show?
They were there in droves. I would say that attendance was up considerably and those that attend are very senior-level people. I know the SNTA members felt the show was very successful from a barter ad sales standpoint. They really got a chance to have advertisers sit down and listen to them and not be distracted by day-to-day work. The show is a great way to focus on syndication for a week. I always felt that way as a buyer.

imagine what you can do™
What was the feedback from advertisers and agencies about the new season?
I did hear a lot of good feedback about the Richard Simmons show [Tribune]. I also got a lot of positive feedback on Relic Hunter [Rysher]. There were mixed reviews on the game shows.

We're hearing that the kids' market will break in late March or April again this year. What are you hearing?
That's probably right.

Any sense on the adult upfront this year?
From what I understand, the advertising budgets are pretty healthy. There's no indication otherwise and it takes a long time if the economy turns bad for advertisers to respond. I think the marketplace is likely to move the same way it did last year. I'd be surprised if syndication didn't go early like it did last year in May because of the amount of inventory that is available.

Your predecessor Tim Duncan was a one-man band. But you have a team. Who's on it?
We have Joanne Milano, who is a research director. She has a pretty heavy agency buying and research background. We have an administrative assistant. And we have the support of all the member organizations. We have a team of people that help us with research from various syndicators. We have a team of members helping us with public relations. So we've been utilizing our members' resources much more than Tim did. We also have marketing and presentation committees made up of our members.

In terms of the competition, who are you taking aim at—network, cable, newspapers, radio, all of the above?
I'm not taking aim at anything. I'm hoping I can convince people that syndication is worth looking at. I'll be trying to get a bigger piece of the pie for syndication. Some syndication shows get 30%-40% of the viewing audience, but there's no way they're getting comparable dollars. I don't ever expect to get 40%. I would kind of like to get more than 2%. It's the same story cable has.

So what's the goal?
My job is not to convince advertisers to buy one show over another, but just to consider the medium and consider using it. It's my members' responsibility to get their own shows sold.

But if you grow the syndication pie, those dollars have to come from somewhere. You can't count on bigger ad budgets.

That's true. When I was in media planning, we had one budget and just because there were 50 new things to buy I didn't get a bigger budget. But maybe I'll convince somebody to take some money she got back from a great print negotiation or maybe it will be money earmarked for network television or cable or a little bit of both. I'm not looking for a lot, just a little.

Why is Madison Avenue and the advertising community biased against syndication?
I think it's a historical perspective. People want things the way they used to be. The biggest bias on Madison Avenue is the ratings difference and the ratings difference isn't really there anymore.

The Bodenmann File

Personal: April 7, 1955, St. Louis; BA Communications/Journalism University of Missouri; married. Jeff Bodenmann, executive vice president and director of worldwide accounts, for publisher IDG (Computer World, books for Dummies series and about 190 other magazine titles); daughter, Grace, 7, who has almost as many contacts in the business as Bodenmann does. “She goes everywhere with me,” she says, including a pre-NATPE trip to New Orleans.

Industry status: Think of her as the Ave Butenksy of barter advertising.

Challenge: To persuade advertisers that syndication is more than network TV’s ugly step-sister, The Jerry Springer Show notwithstanding.

Extracurricular activities: The Hartwood Hunting and Fishing Club, Sullivan County, N.Y. Bodenmann says she takes some guff for the hunting aspect of the club, but swears the family is mainly into fly fishing (except for maybe a pheasant or two in the fall).

Where she cut her teeth: BBDO, for two years in the media-planning department shortly after finishing college. Then it was off to James Jordan Inc. in 1979 (which evolved into Jordan, McGrath, Case & Partners), where she ran the broadcast-buying department for 10 years until last fall.

What are the big growth opportunities for syndication? There’s a big viewing audience between 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. that you can’t reach any other way on a national basis besides using syndication. That’s a big growth opportunity.

What else? Weekend non-sports programming. And someone will come up with a late-night alternative that will stick.

What did you think of Sinclair’s move to auction off weekend time periods to syndicators? In certain markets, that’s been going on for years. But to have a group like that do it in mid-range markets surprised people.

Station people say part of the issue there is the fact that the quality of many of the weekly hours being offered by syndicators is weak and that it’s difficult for stations to make money on those shows. Make sense? Yes, I guess so.

Is that a possible trend? I don’t know. Four or five people may try it, see what happens and then something different will come along. It may become a trend that lasts a while and then people will come up with a different business model. I mean a lot of the shows that clear on the weekends are already paid for because they’re pre-sold in Europe. So this is just gravy they’re getting in the United States.

Will syndication always be the supplementary buy that’s determined largely by how the network market shapes up? I don’t know. The last two or three years the syndication market has gone before the network market in the upfront.

But it was largely shaped by what advertisers thought the network market would be like.

That’s true and I don’t know that it won’t continue to be that way. As an advertiser you’re not going to walk away from doing business with the network. But buyers are spending more time figuring out what percentage they’ll do in different mediums and work backwards on where the deals end up.

Is there any hope for resurrecting the kids’ market in syndication? That’s a tough thing. Cable is a big deal. Programming that got forced into syndication was advertiser-supported. And local stations just didn’t have the interest in it on a 52-week basis. Ten years ago there were stations that owned the kids in their markets in the afternoons. Really, that doesn’t exist anymore. Fox changed that. So it’s a matter of evolving, going on and finding the next thing.

Many advertisers see syndication as a sort of a bifurcated market. They all want to be in a small tier of so-called “A” product, like Friends or Entertainment Tonight. Then there’s the rest that they’re willing to consider if the price is right. How do you combat that?

That’s true everywhere. You go to A&E to buy Biography and maybe a few other things. But during the day do you really want to buy Columbo? It’s true of any individual cable network or even any network. If you want to buy NBC’s Thursday night, it’s how much other stuff do I have to take to get that Thursday night inventory? And not pay the most amount of money possible for it?

So advertisers everywhere are buying stuff they really don’t want. That’s just a fact of life?

There are certain advertisers that buy for tonnage and eyeballs. Those guys don’t mind buying the lower-tier stuff. Others only want the top-tier stuff and they seem to work things out.

Talk shows are problematic. There’s the content issue, which sort of tars the whole pack, perhaps undeservedly. Is that another challenge for you?

I think a few years ago there were content issues with a lot of shows. Donahue went away because of a dentist in Texas (working through Rev. Donald Wildmon) who was obsessed with [Donahue] content issues. But in the last year or so the number of shows with content issues has dwindled. Some people have problems with Jerry Springer, but other people don’t. Same with Ricki Lake. But none of them are like they were when they first went on the air. They’ve all softened up.

Are you planning research to show you how to win some business? We’re looking to develop research, but it’s a project that will take six or eight months.
What's the purpose?
It's way too early to talk about. Right now our main focus is to go out and talk to people and find out what their main reservations are, if there are any.

We've talked about some of the weaker ad categories in syndication. What are some of the stronger ones?
Pharmaceuticals are huge supporters of syndication. They always have been. Movies are all very involved in syndication.

What are your projections for syndication ad sales for 1999 and 2000?
The marketplace is expected to be pretty strong. New categories are emerging, like all the new Internet opportunities. I see pretty much all national broadcast to be pretty healthy.

So where's 1999 going to end up?
All indications are it will be in the 8% range, which is a healthy number.

And 2000?
If I'm successful, it will be even more so for 2000. Assuming something awful doesn't happen to the economy.

The networks continue to be hammered by viewer erosion. Is syndication part of their problem?
No. Overall, syndication is essentially flat year to year. And we don't really program in prime time where they are eroding significantly. So cable is a problem for them, as well as the fact that viewers are changing their viewing habits—more clicking and grazing, because there are so many more choices.

Warner Bros. is combining the cable and syndication broadcast runs of the weekly series Mortal Kombat this season to boost the rating. As a buyer would you have a problem with that?
No. It's a way to get distribution in markets where you are shut out. So it's helping the coverage. It's not unlike the whole WB WeB thing, which is cable in markets 100-plus. So just step back and forget distribution sources and think about viewing options. And with the clicker nobody cares if they are on channel 2 or 72.

So they're just filling in the white space, as it were.
Yes. And I think you're going to see more and more of that. It makes sense. It's better coverage, better rating, higher reach.

How about the case where Pearson is combining the rating of two unrelated game shows—Match Game and 100%?
It's an interesting idea. If they're attracting the same demographic makeup of an audience, I don't know that advertisers will care. Also the rating disparity is not that great. You're not talking about a 6 and a .6. You're talking about a 1 and a 2. So I don't know that people are that hung up on that.

How about the increasing amount of national time in syndication shows, at a time when advertisers are concerned about increasing network clutter?
Well, they're not increasing the overall amount of commercial time in the shows. You're still talking about 14 minutes an hour, just redoing the mix of national versus local. I don't think advertisers really care about the configuration if the total amount of inventory doesn't increase.

Cost of the spots

Of the five syndicated shows commanding the highest per-spot prices, four are off-network sitcom strips (every weekday), according to fourth-quarter 1998 data compiled by Competitive Media Reporting. Friends, X-Files, Seinfeld and Home Improvement were the four most expensive syndication shows to buy in the last quarter. Rounding out the top five is first-run access staple Entertainment Tonight. Below is a list of the 10 most expensive syndicated shows for each of three genres: off-network strips, first-run strips, and first-run weeklies.

The next ‘Big Deal’

Media companies are still in a merger mood

By John M. Higgins

Last year’s strong financial markets and the push to consolidate among media companies, which fueled more than $100 billion worth of industry mergers and takeovers in 1998, show no signs of letting up in 1999.

That’s the assessment of investment bankers and media executives scurrying to find the next deal, whether it’s filling a hole in a regional cable operation or stretching to make a play for an expensive—many say vastly inflated—Internet content company.

Just six weeks into the year, dealmakers are seeing plenty of evidence that kind of heat. Chancellor Media Corp. put its $25 billion radio, TV and billboard portfolio on the block. Two Internet “portals” are doing deals with traditional media groups. Excite Inc. agreed to a $7.4 billion merger with MSO-controlled AT Home Corporation. And Lycos Corp. cut a deal to merge with Home Shopping Network Inc. in an agreement that was initially worth $6 billion, though it is sliding fast as high-growth Internet investors revolt over combining Lycos with a 13-year-old shopping channel that actually has real revenues and profits.

“The new media side of the market has said loudly that ‘We don’t want our growth or our multiple diluted by real businesses,’” said Alan Mnuchin, head of Bear Stearns’ media and entertainment banking.

DirecTV recently cut a deal for fading direct broadcast satellite rival Primestar. And Charter Communications Inc. jumped into a $2.4 billion three-way system deal with Tele-Communications Inc. and Intermedia Partners.

“I see a ton of activity across almost all those sectors,” said Jill Greenthal, media investment banker for Donaldson, Lufkin, Jenrette, describing the latest media merger trend. “The real challenge is going to be how conventional companies broaden their reach into the Internet economically.”

According to the Securities Data Corp., last year, proposed and completed media mergers and acquisitions of U.S. cable, radio and broadcast TV companies totaled $112 billion. That number was inflated by AT&T’s unusually outsized $50 billion deal to buy Tele-Communications Inc.

Broadcasting & Cable’s own tally of TV and radio station deals found a slight decline in overall 1998 trading, $22.8 billion, down 3% from 1997. That’s largely from a sharp 41% drop off in AM-FM radio combos, whose volume fell to $7.4 billion from $12.7 billion. However, that was almost completely offset by a 254% rise in the volume of TV-radio station pairings, which surged from $1.9 billion to $6.5 billion last year.

Wall Street and media executives see no end in sight. Overall, the pace of cable takeovers is expected to continue, particularly since new entrants AT&T and Microsoft Corp. co-founder Paul Allen have openly acknowledged that they want to buy more. Investment bankers also expect a good number of TV station groups to come on the market. But the question is whether a downturn in station stocks will translate into depressed prices in private transactions.

Radio, however, is a trouble spot. The industry has contracted so dramatically over the past four years that most of the medium-sized companies are gone—swallowed up by huge station operators. “I think radio is spent,” observed one media investment banker.

The standout deal last year was AT&T’s agreement to acquire Tele-Communications Inc. But most major takeovers involved the big getting bigger, such as radio group Jacor Communications impending $6.3 billion sale to an even larger station owner, Clear Channel Communications. Other deals saw major players rearranging their existing portfolios—such as Chancellor Media Corp.’s $4.2 billion swallowing of Capstar Broadcasting Corp.

Both companies were already controlled by buyout fund Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst.

The AT&T-TCI deal is different, though. It’s one that promises to transform both companies and even the telephone industry. Although AT&T chairman Mike Arm strong valued TCI at more than $50 billion, the MSO’s core cable business was almost an afterthought. Armstrong is looking to use TCI as the cornerstone of a new local telephone operation, teaming up with and buying other cable operators to mount the first significant challenge to the Baby Bells and independent telcos’ lock on the local residential market.

“Mike [Armstrong] is trying to create a new company,” said TCI President Leo Hindery, who is slated to run the cable operations when the deal closes, it is hoped, by March.

The financial play is a combination of capturing local revenue and steering around the pricey access fees AT&T is forced to pay local Bell gatekeepers to traffic long-distance calls into consumers’ homes. Even if the company doesn’t buy any more systems and instead merely partners with other cable operators, AT&T could easily wind up investing another $12 billion.

For the past several years radio has been the hot transaction sector. But that has suddenly changed with the recent retreat of the most aggressive buyer of all, Chancellor Media Corp. Chairman Tom Hicks has put the Dallas-based radio, billboard and TV company up for sale, most likely through a stock swap.

Any merger of the $25 billion Chancellor will leave controlling shareholder Hicks, Muse, Tate & Furst with a huge continuing interest in the sector, so the buyout fund won’t be simply exiting radio. Such a dramatic reversal for the acquisitive Chancellor—which cut 24 media takeovers in two years—is likely to take the heat out of station auctions that have driven prices past 18 times annual cash flow.

“If Tom Hicks is selling, why should I be buying?” said one media investment banker. “I think it makes people like Steve Dodge look really smart,” said one investment banker of the chairman of American Radio, which sold at top dollar to Infinity last year. “He was smart enough to realize that when there are almost no buyers big enough to buy you, you better get out.”

Chancellor is going to have a tough time running an auction. The only obvious buyers are Clear Channel and Infinity. Wall Street executives believe that Chancellor and Infinity overlap too much in markets like New York for a deal to easily pass antitrust muster. Clear Channel has openly expressed interest, but is not known for offering top dollar.

The quick flurry of direct broadcast satellite takeovers won’t be repeated this year. But that’s because the sector is shrinking to just two players. DirecTV is buying PrimeStar Corp. and United States Satellite Broadcasting Inc. And EchoStar Communications Corp. is buying News Corp.’s American Sky Broadcasting.

Right now, broadcast television is in a bit of a holding pattern. Recession fears hammered station group stocks unusually hard last July when the Russian economy collapsed. But while the rest of the market simply shrugged it off and kept climbing, broadcasters have not.

With stocks down 25%-35% from their highs, what has happened to station values? The last sizable deals were pre-crash—Hearst-Argyle Television’s $1.9 billion deal to buy Pulitzer Publishing’s TV and radio stations and its $520 million deal to buy Kelly Broadcasting’s two stations. Both deals ran close to 15 times cash flow.

Look for some properties to start trickling out onto the market over the next couple of months. Sinclair Broadcasting Inc. is looking to lighten up and is soliciting offers on just about any slice of its portfolio.

Granite Broadcasting has an Austin, Texas station up for sale, and Lin Television, which is in the process of being acquired by Chancellor, is likely to come back onto the market.

“These are going to be the transactions that test whether the 14-15 times multiples of the summer of 1998 are going to hold,” said John Chachas, a media investment banker for CS First Boston.

It won’t be long before we see just how strong media properties are in 1999.
Merger Mania

Cable’s cast changes with AT&T and Vulcan takeovers

By John M. Higgins

It only takes two serious suitors to fuel a buying frenzy. And with two new, huge buyers around, investment bankers aren’t expected to have a quiet year.

The emergence of AT&T Corp. and Microsoft Corp.’s co-founder, multibillionaire Paul Allen, as aggressive buyers of cable systems has skewed the takeover equations of recent years. Usually, one type of buyer was the traditional large established players, like Cox or Comcast. Almost always, one if not both could be counted upon at every major MSO auction, often financing their deals internally.

The other was often an institutional investor relatively new to cable who sensed opportunity amid slipping prices in 1996 and 1997. Those players, primarily massive takeover funds, used their cash to back ventures run by existing cable management groups.

Multibillion-dollar funds like the Carlyle Group, which backed Prime Cable in its venture, usually took passive positions. They didn’t want to run a cable company. For them, the primary concern was being able to exit in seven years or so with at least a 30% annualized return on investment.

But AT&T and Allen’s Vulcan Ventures are different. They’re “strategic” buyers with a mission. They want cable systems for specific purposes: In AT&T’s case, it wants to use the wire strung into millions of homes to extend the reach of its telephone services; in Allen’s case, it’s his vision of a new interactive “wired world.” Strategic buyers want returns, but they’re willing to invest heavily to make their other visions a reality.

“For a consolidated industry, it was pretty busy,” said Comcast Vice Chairman Julian Brodsky. “Paul Allen’s appearance certainly changed things—a lot of things. It raised the bar on prices.”

That makes them a seller’s favorite kind of bidder: tremendously motivated and armed with unusually deep pockets.

“We don’t see things slowing down much,” said Brian Devey, president of cable investment banker Daniels & Associates. “The suggestion that the people doing bigger deals are going to take time to digest them is wrong.”

AT&T and Vulcan executives acknowledge they’re not finished. “What we’re trying to accomplish is important,” said Jerry Kent, chairman of Charter Communications Inc., which is now Allen’s cable vehicle.

Four of the top 10 cable operators changed hands last year. Tele-Communications Inc. cut a deal with AT&T for $50 billion. Allen spent $7 billion gobbling up Charter Communications Inc. and Marcus Cable Corp. Comcast Corp bought a controlling stake in Jones Intercable Inc. and is widely expected to acquire the 63% of the company held by other investors.

Plenty of activity is already shaping up for 1999. Two potential takeover targets are in the offing this year. Prospective buyers are already perusing the sales “book” for Century Communications Corp., which is shopping for a buyer. Industry executives widely expect MediaOne Group Inc. to go as well, with Vulcan, which made an approach last year, and AT&T considered likely suitors.

Charter and TCI have already teamed up to buy most of Intermedia Partners. Through a complicated series of system swaps and outright purchases, Charter is taking a $1.3 billion chunk of southeastern systems off Intermedia’s hands. TCI—read AT&T—is taking properties worth another $1.1 billion.

Executives are titillated—but far less confident—about speculation surrounding Cox Communications, but nevertheless have been rumbling that the parent company Cox Enterprises Inc. may be getting ready to part with their cable unit. Those rumors have surprised Cox executives.

Indeed, Cox is expected to join Comcast as the most aggressive buyer among established MSO players this year, as they were in 1998. Cox lost out to Comcast for the suburban Washington systems, while Comcast lost out to Cox in Las Vegas.

One established player is largely absent from recent activity. Time Warner Chairman Gerald Levin said he is avoiding major acquisitions of any kind in the near future, preferring to keep his stock and debt levels stable.

There’s plenty of action among smaller MSOs as well, especially for small-town properties and less and less for major urban and suburban clusters. Startups like Mediacom, run by former Cablevision Industries Inc. CFO Rocco Comisso, is seen as a buyer, as is Renaissance Media.

And the same sirens that beckoned AT&T and Vulcan are drawing other institutional investors. It’s the prospect that telephone, Internet and interactive products are going to fuel another wave of growth.

“There’s a lot of money chasing deals,” said Waller Capital Corp. chairman John Waller. “There’s no shortage of institutional players.”
Going, going, gone...

Slowdown in radio consolidation offset by broadcasting megadeals

By Elizabeth A. Rathbun

Last year, an astonishing number of multibillion-dollar station deals kept total spending on TV and radio stations nearly the same as 1997—$22.9 billion, compared with $23.44 billion. While such huge dollars have been rare in the past, brokers say, fully half of the top 10 deals of the year ranged from $1 billion to $4.4 billion.

The boom, however, was mitigated somewhat by the pace of radio consolidation, which should continue to slow as broadcast companies digest recent post-deregulation acquisitions (since February 1996), according to media brokers.

"Radio, for all practical purposes, is consolidated," says Brian Cobb of Media Venture Partners. "There's less stations to sell" in the aftermath of the Telecommunications Act of 1996.

"There has been and will be a fall off in [radio] transactions," says broker Richard Foreman of Richard A. Foreman Associates. "Most of the work in the top 50 [markets] has been done." But that may be good news for sellers in medium and smaller markets, where prices could ratchet up a cash-flow point or two.

While megadeals contributed to a major chunk of total spending last year, those dollars were offset by a 52% decline in FM spending and a 41% decrease in dollars spent on radio combos-deals that involve both FM and AM stations (see "TV & Radio Spending Growth" chart).

"Radio, for all practical purposes, is consolidated." There are fewer stations to sell in the post-deregulation era.

—Brian Cobb, Media Ventures Partners

As for television stations, spending should stay apace this year say media brokers, unless the FCC or Congress takes major steps to deregulate that industry.

"Any relaxation of the television ownership rules will send the TV volume straight up," says Fred Kalil, vice president of Kalil & Company Inc.

"It's a great time to consider selling because the prices are so high," says W. Lawrence Patrick of Patrick Communications, who offers that advice to short-term TV and radio station owners. Towards the end of last year, Patrick was working on a deal for WLEX-TV Lexington, Ky., which ended up going for "an amazing price" of 14.6 times its cash flow, or about $100 million. Though he expects TV prices to come down a bit this year—it won't be a lot. "There are more TV buyers than there are sellers, so prices are through the roof," Patrick observes.

With major radio markets tapped out, radio consolidation is "slowing down some and it's clearly heading into smaller markets." Station prices in mid-sized and small radio markets should be down slightly this year, Patrick says, "but they're still very strong."

"I don't think we're going to see any

TV & Radio Spending Growth

Total dollars spent on combination TV-radio deals climbed 254% in 1998, compared with 1997, with several multibillion-dollar deals making the difference. Radio AMs followed, tallying a 65% increase. Overall, however, declines in combos and FMs offset the gains and kept 1998 spending nearly even when compared with the year before. This chart compares the deals of 1998 to those of 1997 (by dollars spent/number of deals).

Radio's big new companies are busy now whipping their acquisitions into shape rather than buying more stations: "Now it becomes a question of operating," Kalil says.

He adds that 1998 was a phenomenal year. "It's going to be tougher to duplicate that" this year he notes. But he pins his hopes on buyers from outside the media industry to create major deals.

Interestingly, the dollars spent on AM stations last year rose nearly 65%. It's probably more of a revival of talk-based formats oriented to AM than a case of buyers being closed out of FM by prices, Foreman says. "There have been a lot of competing voices for AMs around the country," from Radio Disney, Catholic Radio Network LLC, all-sports broadcasters as well as buyers of Spanish-language stations. These companies simply don't need the high fidelity that FM provides, Foreman explains.

But the big unknown this year, of course, is Chancellor Media Corp., that mostly radio company that recently put itself on the block [Broadcasting & Cable, Jan. 25]. A single deal there—or a series of spin-offs—could dramatically affect 1999's numbers.

TV and radio top sellers in 1998

Station trading in 1998 added up to $22.8 billion for 950 deals. This list outlines only deals worth $5 million or more (in the case of TV and TV-radio) and $2 million or more (radio-only transactions). Where stations involved in a deal are in more than one state, the list is ordered by price. Single-state deals are ordered alphabetically by state, then city. The following abbreviations are used throughout the list: CP for construction permit; LMA for local marketing agreement.

By hiring former Fox Entertainment President Peter Roth, Warner Bros. Television is getting an executive who understands intimately how to operate in a vertically integrated company that is building both a broadcast network and a studio.

That talent will play well at Warner Bros., which is seeking to regain the crown as the top prime time programming supplier, while also fueling its network, The WB, with more powerful products.

Roth's knowledge of both sides of the fence was a key reason he was tapped last week to head Warner Bros.' network television production division, according to executives familiar with the company's thinking. "Warner Bros. will be providing a lot of WB product, and here you have a former programming executive at a successful, young-demographic network suddenly coming available," said Peter Dekom, an independent media investment banker. "How many people have that experience?"

Warner Bros. television chief Tony Jonas did not, although he could boast 10 years as a top executive at Warner Bros. And last year, after an unprecedented 10 years as the most prolific studio on network prime time, Warner Bros. slipped to a tie with Fox as the leading network supplier.

WB network head Jamie Kellner, coming off the young network's biggest fall start ever, made no secret at the January press tour of his disappointment that Warner Bros. wasn't supplying more shows to the network. In addition, he had to watch Warner Bros. shows like ER and Friends pull down huge numbers for the competition while the studio's The Wayans Bros, Jamie Foxx, For Your Love and this season's struggling Hyperion Bay, could not display any similar power.

Industry executives said those factors were key in the decision by Warner Bros. Co-Chairmen Bob Daly and Terry Semel and Chief Operating Officer Barry Meyer to make the change.

Roth, who himself departed Fox last November after a disappointing start, has played a key role in nurturing Fox's breakout shows of the last few years, including Ally McBeal, King of the Hill and promising new shows The PJs and Family Guy.

"I've had experience in a vertically integrated company and I've been successful in it," Roth last week, "but I'd like to believe that it was due to the quality of the product.

In a post where the decisions are high-profile and the pressure to perform is great, Roth is known for a collegial style and a genuine love of developing new shows that made him a popular executive at Fox. "Peter is an extremely talented development executive," said Sandy Grushow, president of Fox's 20th Century Fox studio.

"I have no doubt he'll do a fine job at Warner Bros."

Roth will take over at Warner Bros. March 1, a crucial time for studios, when pilots are being aired for the May upfront season. Roth's congeniality is likely to be tested as he wrestles over ownership issues with networks such as NBC, still smarting over Warner Bros.' $13-million-an-episode price tag for ER last season.

Jonas's options now include accepting a 3 1/2-year production deal offered by Warner Bros. or sitting tight and waiting for another studio or network to make him an offer. His departure was accompanied by the resignation of the studio's second-in-command, Gary Levine.

P&G feeds the meter

One of TV's top advertisers, Procter & Gamble, has cast a vote for people-metering in local markets with its decision to reduce its spot television buying. Higher-quality data, the giant advertiser says, will make its brands—which purchase ads individually—more confident of hitting the right consumers. Currently people meters are used to research viewership for national broadcast, cable and syndicated shows—which may gain from the locals' losses. Diaries are used to research demographics locally. P&G would not disclose how much of its ad budget would be redirected, but said the money would come back to local TV if the data improved.

The company has complained about the perceived inadequacy of diaries since early last year. Nielsen Media Research agrees with P&G that people-metering is the "gold standard" for viewer information, but notes resistance by stations using meters that monitor TV but not demographics. That's due to the meters' cost and the fact that dominant stations typically lose locally when such set-tuning meters replace diaries. Withholding some Procter & Gamble dollars may jump-start an effort toward local people-metering, Nielsen said.
Talkers are talk of syndie sweeps

In tight market, rivals hope some freshman shows will flunk out in February

By Joe Schlosser

With the February Sweeps in full swing, the hottest topic in syndication these days is the fate of the three new daytime talk shows: Paramount Domestic Television's Howie Mandel Show, King World's The Roseanne Show and Columbia TriStar Television Distribution's Donny & Marie.

Last year at this time, a similar debate was being held over the future of three late-night efforts: The Keenen Ivory Wayans Show, Vibe and The Magic Hour, all of which were eventually shown the door.

All three daytime shows this season are averaging less than a 2.0 national and all three shows currently occupy prime real estate in major and even lesser markets. Add to the mix one of the most crowded syndication marketplaces in memory, and the possible cancellation of any of the shows has drawn a pack of competitors ready to move in at the first sign of blood, although all the talkers' studios suggest they won't give them that opportunity.

A number of new daytime shows on the NATPE Conference floor last month are still in need of top-market clearances and/or better time periods. The loss of Mandel, Roseanne or the Osmonds offers potential time slots for Buena Vista Television's Let's Make a Deal, Tribune Entertainment's Dream Maker with Richard Simmons, Pearson Television's Family Feud remake, King World's The Martin Short Show and a number of other new first-run shows. The loss of any or all of the three talkers could also benefit longtime daytime shows looking for upgrades.

"I think the February sweeps is going to be a tell-all for many programs out there, and we syndicators are sitting tight and I know my sales force is ready to move and we already have a lot of deals that are contingent on certain shows leaving the marketplace," says Joe Scotti, executive vice president of domestic distribution and marketing at Pearson Television North America. "There is no doubt in anybody's mind which shows are vulnerable, and we are going to try and seize those time periods."

"Come March 30 when all of the [February ratings] books are in, decisions are going to be made and programs that are sort of contingent on performance, both in terms of shows that are currently on the air and in terms of time periods that shows could acquire based on others moving around, are going to be common in Hollywood," says Bill Carroll, vice president and director of programming at Katz Television. "It may not really be reflected in May, but it will dramatically affect key markets come September."

Dick Kurlander, vice president and director of programming at Petry Television, says it is important for both Donny & Marie and The Roseanne Show to show improved ratings in February if a second season is going to be possible.

"Howie [Mandel] is over for all intents and purposes," Kurlander says. "Roseanne is probably going to shake out as well. Donny & Marie will likely stick it out another season—that's what the Columbia executives are saying."

Paramount executives dispute that early obituary on Howie, saying the show is not dead and that the studio is sticking by it. Mandel's program, which got an early June 1998 launch, is the only talk show of the three without a two-year clearance deal. "We would love the numbers to go up on Howie and we are hoping to get some growth in February," says Frank Kelly, co-president at Paramount Domestic Television. "We're doing some fun and exciting things during February and if Howie trends up, that will be a very good thing. We love this guy and we think he does a great show every day."

Paramount executives have not announced any clearances for next season on the show, but say they are in talks with stations.

As for The Roseanne Show, it got its first major blow earlier in the month, when a number of stations downgraded it, including WNBC-TV New York. Jeff Wald, Roseanne's manager and an executive producer on the former sitcom star's talk show, points out that hit shows like Live with Regis and Kathie Lee and Jerry Springer didn't start off with big ratings.

"If the stations stay with our show, they are going to have a hit on their hands," he said.

Speculation surrounding Roseanne's potential cancellation comes in part from competing syndicators who say King World executives are looking to fill that talk show's time periods with next season's announced launch of The Martin Short Show. King World executives deny that is the case, saying Short's program has been cleared in over 60% of the country without the benefit of a single Roseanne time period.

Over at Columbia TriStar Television Distribution, President Barry Thurston says it's business as usual with Donny & Marie and that the show will be back next fall. Donny & Marie is cleared in over 97% of the country for the 1999-2000 season, according to Thurston.

"The good news for us on Donny and Marie is we haven't lost any time periods and in fact we have been upgraded in a number of markets and our plans for this month are to notch it up to another level and hopefully gain more momentum as we head into next year," Thurston says.
Shopping talker bagged
Pearson Television executives have opted not to go forward with planned syndicated talk show Christopher and Camilla at the Mall. Sources say sluggish clearances and the potential multimillion-dollar cost of the hour program added up to a no-go for the show. Christopher and Camilla was to have debuted this fall in syndication and was to be based at a New York shopping complex. Christopher Lowell of Discovery Channel's Interior Motives and veteran Canadian TV personality Camilla Scott were set to host the show.

A major 7th
The WB is in 7th Heaven. The family drama produced the highest ratings in the young network's history on Monday night (Feb. 8). According to overnight figures released by Nielsen Media Research last week, the show scored a 9.7 rating/14 share. The drama ranked No. 1 in its time period and was up 52% in rating and 56% in share from the previous week's episode.

From Dylan to disco
Fresh from a strong ratings showing for its sweeps miniseries The 60s (it aired Feb. 7 and 8), NBC Studios has signed a deal with executive producer Linda Obst to create a follow-up series, The 70s, chronicling the same family's trek through that decade. The 60s earned an impressive 10.7/25 among adults 18-49.

Weighing anchors (reporters, actually)
ABC's Good Morning America continued its makeover last week with the addition of a new series, "Lose Weight with Good Morning America." ABC News Correspondents Cynthia McFadden and Sylvia Chase will visit participating affiliates to "weigh in" employees for the report.

Correction
In last week's edition of Broadcasting & Cable, the premiere date for the CBS sitcom Payne was incorrectly reported. The series debuts Monday, March 15.

Iowa, the pay-me state

Film of a car chase by Council Bluffs, Iowa, police came at a price: about $20. Most Iowa records are, by law, public, but there are some exceptions. Although police made the tape available to news media, they sought to recover costs by charging them for it. In the film, following a pursuit, a Chevy van flips and the driver is thrown from the vehicle. Although not seriously hurt, the driver faces a multitude of charges. Regarding the charges, the kmtv(TV) Omaha news director said, "I've never heard of it before. Is it the same as if 60 Minutes bought an interview? I don't think so. In Omaha it's usually a fight to get a tape like this. I'm glad they made it available, although I'm not happy I had to pay $20. If it was $100, no way. It's a half-decent tape; a little hard to see. But they delivered it in a timely fashion. I don't think it's highway robbery."

Akron-Cleveland connection

Wews(TV) Cleveland is offering Akron-area reports from inside the newsroom of a local newspaper, The Beacon Journal. The station will be setting up shop in what used to be the paper's composing room, as part of a strategic alliance between the two news groups set up last summer, the station's news director, Milt Weiss, explained. "It's part of an attempt to put our reporters and theirs in proximity," said Weiss.

For the station, the relationship acknowledges that Wews can no longer think of itself as just a Cleveland station. About one-third of our audience lives in the Akron-Canton area," said Weiss. Also envisioned are cross-promotions and serialized stories, told in complementary parts on TV and in print. The Beacon Journal plans to promote itself by advancing nightly news stories that will appear in more detail in the next day's paper. The Akron-based newsroom alliance was put to a quick test in its first week when tire giant and major local employer Goodyear gained control of the Japanese company Sumitomo Rubber Industries Ltd. "We got word of it, and they [The Beacon Journal] had several reporters on the story. We were able to get on the air with more information than any station in the area."

The core of the Big Apple

Spanish-language station wxtv(TV) Paterson, N.J. found a small settlement underneath New York City during a special report made for February sweeps. Noticias 41 reporter Berenice Saavedra and her crew followed homeless people down a West Side Amtrak track into Manhattan's cavernous underground railroad tunnels and found several people making their homes there. The story, La Ciudad de Abajo, (The City Underneath), is also referred to as the story of "the mole people": the name given the under-ground dwellers when similar stories were told in the early 1990s. One of those writers, Margaret Morton, became a source for the story of this continuing situation. Saavedra's research had indicated a significant number of homeless, many from Puerto Rico, Mexico and Cuba. The reporters were told of other "settlements" in other parts of New York's massive underground, and even children living there. The reporters themselves experienced the danger of underground living when they had to move themselves and their equipment quickly to avoid being run down by an Amtrak train. Although the darkness of the setting presented a problem, special projects producer Ninoska Arriaga says the footage of the people, their thrown-away mattresses and their makeshift kitchens, is dramatic.

Good morning Minneapolis

Kmsp-Tv Minneapolis plans an early-morning news and entertainment show for launch later this year. The show is currently planned for 6-9 a.m., in competition with network morning shows. Plans call for hiring an additional 30 staffers, and for a fall target date. The station, a Chris-Craft-owned UPN affiliate, credits the success of its 90-minute evening news block for the expansion.

Boston baseball changes dugouts

Tribune Broadcasting, which owns the Chicago Cubs and carries games for that team, the Chicago White Sox, Colorado Rockies and Los Angeles Dodgers, is adding the Boston Red Sox to its line up. Wlvi-Tv Boston will carry up to 80 spring training and regular season games for the 1999 and 2000 seasons. The Red Sox had been carried by Boston University-owned wabu(TV). Their rights are now owned by Jcs New England Television Network. Jcs will produce and distribute the games to a growing lineup of stations that includes Wlvi; Wlne(Tv) Providence, R.I.; Wttx-Tv Hartford, Conn.; Wpme(Tv) Portland, Maine; Wabi(Tv) and Wbcr(Tv), both Bangor, Maine, and Wbvt(Tv) Burlington, Vt. The Jcs in New England Television Network is Jankowski Communications System Inc, headed by Gene F. Jankowski, former president and chairman of the CBS Broadcast Group.

The milkman cometh

In a truly animated upfront presentation last week, Fox Kids Network unveiled seven new series (most produced in-house at Saban, 50% owner of the network) for its weekend and weekday time periods for 1999-2000. The new shows, in alphabetical order: The Avengers (Saban/Marvel); Beast Hunters (Mainframe Entertainment); Beast Wars (Mainframe); Big Guy and Rusty the Robot (Columbia TriStar); Cyber 9 (Saban); NASCAR Superchargers (Saban); and Spider-Man Unlimited (Saban). Fox Kids and Fox Family Entertainment presented their new programs (scheduling to be announced later) to advertisers last week at New York's Hudson Theatre. The breakfast-theme presentation featured Fox Kids/Fox Family President Rich Cronin in pajamas and robe; the networks' general manager, Maureen Smith, in jogging attire, and Saban owner and Fox Kids/Fox Family Managing Partner Haim Saban, as the milkman. "You believe what they make me do for a few shekels from you?" asked Saban, goat and milk in tow.

Vanocur gets Olympic beat

Second-generation newsman breaks story about 2002 Winter Games in Salt Lake City

By Dan Trigoboff

The international probe over Olympic irregularities began in a Salt Lake City newsroom with a second-generation TV reporter.

"I've been doing this almost 20 years," KTVX(1V)'s Chris Vanocur says. "I knew this was a good story. But I don't think anyone saw that it would be this big."

Just last week, Salt Lake City's own Organizing Committee's ethics panel found that several members of the International Olympic Committee accepted more than $1 million in cash payments, scholarships, vacations, medical expenses and other gifts as Salt Lake locals lobbied to get the 2002 Winter Games. Some leaders of the Salt Lake Organizing Committee have already stepped down in the wake of the scandal.

It began for Vanocur just before Thanksgiving with a note passed to him from an unnamed source, but written by a prominent Salt Lake organizer to the daughter of a now-deceased IOC member, indicating that she had received educational benefits from the committee. After researching the late Rene Essomba and his daughter, Sonia, both of Cameroon, Vanocur took the letter to Olympic officials and the story took off. It has now been confirmed that Sonia Essomba received more than $100,000 in tuition and living expenses while a student in Washington and that the local organizer had even represented her in dealings with her landlord. Other questionable transactions involving other officials involve skis, vacations, and shopping sprees.

For Vanocur, son of legendary newsman Sander Vanocur, it's been a full-time story. "Chris has broken several developments in this story," said KTVX News Director Tom Sides, "and he's been maintaining the lead."

Vanocur, the station's chief political reporter, says "This is really a political story. It's just old-fashioned street reporting. You hear things, you work the pavement, work sources." But, he adds, "without question this is the biggest story I'll ever break. My dad and I have had that discussion."
Pax bids bon voyage to Travel
Sells remaining 30% interest to Discovery Channel to fend off possible cash-flow woes

By Michael Stroud

By selling its remaining stake in The Travel Channel to the Discovery Channel, Bud Paxson is betting that he can prevent a cash crunch while continuing his ambitious plans to build the nation’s seventh broadcast network.

Analysts say the $55 million sale of Paxson’s 30% stake in Travel is the right move—perhaps his only move—at a time when he plans to invest as much as $60 million in new programming for Pax TV over the next year. Paxson also wants to start three new digital programming services. Now the question is whether he can grow advertising revenue fast enough to turn around the company’s negative cash flow, analysts said.

“There’s always a risk of a liquidity crunch” with a high-growth company like Paxson, said analyst Bishop Cheen of First Union Capital Markets. “On paper, if Paxson sticks to the plan and manages its fixed costs, it has enough internal liquidity to meet its needs and get the network up and growing.”

A Discovery spokeswoman said company executives are “always happy” to own 100% of any operation they run.

Cheen estimated that Paxson will report negative cash flow of between $30 million and $40 million for its fourth quarter over the next few weeks. But he predicted that if Paxson can continue to grow subscribers and keep expenses in check, it has a strong shot at positive cash flow by the end of the second quarter. Solid profitability, though, is one to three years off, he added.

Paxson is gambling that he can build distribution for his “family-friendly” programming through a novel combination of broadcasting from 100 broadcast stations, augmented by cable outlets and satellite transmission. His programming includes a mix of original programming such as Flipper: The New Adventures and reruns such as Touched by an Angel.

Paxson officials declined to comment.

The sale of The Travel Channel is key. To grow the programming service, Chief Executive Jeff Sagansky has said he plans to sell off non-core assets such as Travel Channel.”

Still, it’s a non-core asset that has appreciated nicely for Paxson. In 1997, Paxson sold a 70% stake in the channel to Discovery for $20 million and undisclosed consulting fees—less than half what 30% sold for last week.

“Given the prospects for travel by baby boomers, the prospects for The Travel Channel seem bright,” said Hal Vogel, a New York-based media analyst. “They must have needed to cash out.”

Fox’s new kids on the block

Fox Family Channel and Fox Kids Network last week unveiled an ambitious new programming slate for the 1999-2000 season. Here are some of the high points: Fox Family Channel, the Fox-Saban cable channel revamped last summer with an all-day kids lineup, plans to offer 12 new series and 327 original episodes to its daytime lineup. The channel will add 10 new animated series, including a stop-motion Claymation series, Rotten Ralph, based on the Harper Collins book series and Weird Oh, a hot rod comedy. In live-action, the channel will offer Back to Sherwood, a new take on the classic Robin Hood story and Dream Force Angels, a magical series about four princesses. The channel has also ordered 93 new episodes of six returning shows, including Thomas the Tank Engine and Enigma. Fox Kids, the broadcast network, will add seven new animated series and 260 new episodes to its weekday and Saturday morning programming (see Broadcasting section, page 60).—Michael Stroud

Lowell ‘Bud’ Paxson is selling non-core assets to grow his programming service.

MediaOne opts for open cable
Inks multi-vendor deal for digital cable boxes with Dutch giant Philips and Divicom

By Richard Tedesco

MediaOne struck a multi-vendor set-top pact last week that offers consumers choices about digital cable boxes while giving Philips Electronics a leg up in the U.S. market.

The deal, which makes Philips, Canal+ and Divicom digital set-top suppliers for MediaOne, ostensibly advances the advent of digital cable service in the Denver-based MSO's U.S. markets.

It sets the stage for MediaOne to extend its digital cable offering beyond the Detroit market, where it currently passes 50,000 households. Rollout and pricing plans for other MediaOne markets are due within a month as it prepares to introduce digital service in at least two more systems during the second quarter.

The vendors, all suppliers to digital cable initiatives abroad, will build interoperable boxes compliant with CableLabs' OpenCable specification that will enable them to work in any MediaOne system. That is intended to encourage cable customers to buy the boxes at local retail outlets, making digital cable a more accessible medium and letting the operator out of its traditional role as hardware supplier.

So MediaOne becomes the first U.S. operator actively embracing the open digital standard, and pushing retail availability of the boxes one year ahead of the federal July 2000 deadline.

"Anything that a cable company can do to accelerate the rollout of these digital boxes is a good thing," said Tom Eagan, analyst with PaineWebber. "The real endgame here for the cable operator is to have all the equipment at retail."

Eagan estimates that box prices at retail will ease from an initial range of $275-$325 to the low $200 range, partly depending on whether operators subsidize their distribution.

He sees Philips' presence in the deal as a reflection of MediaOne's international cable holdings, as well as a new market opportunity for the Dutch electronics giant.

"Certainly there's a market here that's burgeoning," Eagan notes.

As part of the initiative, MediaOne is expanding its relationship with General Instrument, which will develop digital systems incorporating the international open system by the first quarter of next year.

MediaOne didn't indicate how many digital boxes it is committed to buying from the respective vendors involved or precisely when initial deliveries are anticipated.

After they arrive this summer, the first generation of interoperable digital boxes will give way to a second generation—next year—incorporating point of deployment (POD) cards linking the boxes to specific operators' systems.

"From an industry perspective, it means we can deploy set-top boxes based on the best products," said Bud Wonsiewicz, chief technical officer of MediaOne. "Ultimately, we look forward to the day when the set-top will disappear."

Before that happens, MediaOne will add functionality to succeeding generations of the new boxes, according to Wonsiewicz, who says delivering digital video and video-on-demand will be their primary functions at first.

Both General Instrument and Scientific Atlanta have publicly committed to working on an open cable digital standard as part of the CableLabs effort.

CABLE'S TOP 25
PEOPLE'S CHOICE

USA's success with daily reruns of 'Walker, Texas Ranger' continued last week. The Wednesday episode got a 3.3 rating/5.2 share.

Following are the top 25 basic cable programs for the week of Feb. 1-7, ranked by rating. Cable rating is coverage area rating within each basic cable network's universe; U.S. rating is of 98 million TV households. Sources: Nielsen Media Research, Turner Entertainment.

‘Work Release’ possible for Tyson

Cable and PPV boxing mainstay Mike Tyson could fight again, if corrections officials in Maryland apply work-release principles to the former heavyweight champion’s unusual occupation. Tyson was given a one-year sentence after pleading no contest on charges of assaulting two men after a traffic accident, but he could be eligible for work-release after 60 days. An official from the corrections department in Montgomery County, Md., where Tyson was sentenced, suggested that, given Tyson’s line of work, he might be allowed to train and fight out of town, so long as officials could verify his location and that he remained drug and alcohol-free. The youngest heavyweight champion ever, Tyson’s knockout power and tumultuous career have made him a major draw in cable and pay-TV for more than a decade. But at 32, his time is limited, and has already been compromised by his three years in prison in Indiana after a rape conviction and his suspension for biting off a piece of champion Evander Holyfield’s ear.

Deals, deals

Scientific-Atlanta Inc. cut a deal to supply high-end Explorer 2000 digital set-top converters to Canadian MSO Videotron, which will enable the company to offer interactive digital services to cable subscribers in Montreal. The equipment will allow two-way services, including video-on-demand, Internet access and e-mail on television. Videotron is planning to provide digital services to 70% of its upgraded Montreal system in the first half of 1999. Videotron’s Quebec systems in Quebec City, Chicoutimi and Hull will get digital services later this year. S-A said 17 cable operators in the U.S. and Canada have committed to deploy its digital interactive system.

Anglo-American ‘Cracker’

A&E has acquired the rights to the short-lived ABC series Cracker, based on the award-winning British series of the same name. The network will devote an entire week to the show, airing both the UK and U.S. versions starting Monday, Feb. 22. In total, A&E will air 16 episodes of the ABC version, which starred Robert Pastorelli as a psychologist who profiles killers, including four never before-seen installments.

History for the ages

The upcoming millennium is now history. On Feb. 15, The History Channel will premiere its new slogan, “The official network of every millennium,” in 30-second TV ads. The spot consists of images that connect time periods. The promotional campaign also includes a display at Madison Square Garden and print advertisements.

Watch out Westminster

Animal Planet inked a multiyear pact with the BBC to be the sole U.S. outlet for the “world’s biggest and most prestigious” annual canine competition, the Crufts Dog Show. The telecasts, Friday, March 12 through Sunday, March 14 from 8-9 p.m. (ET/PT) will provide U.S. viewers with same-day coverage of the Birmingham, England event. Some 20,000 canines are expected to compete, a figure said to be far higher than those of the largest U.S. dog shows. Animal Planet National Dog Show Championship’s correspondents Wayne Cavanaugh and Michael Barkann will be the anchors in England. “Dog competitions are a key part of our strategy and the telecast of the Crufts will be a significant step for Animal Planet,” said Clark Bunting, senior VP and general manager. The Crufts will mark the finale of a week of dog competitions on the channel. On Sunday, March 7, the winner of the inaugural Animal Planet dog-show season will be awarded the Eukanuba Cup at the Animal Planet National Dog Champion in Los Angeles.

‘Crossing the Floor’ is crossing the pond

BBC America will air the critically acclaimed Parliamentary satire, Crossing the Floor, Feb. 23. The flick stars Tom Wilkinson, best known to U.S. audiences for giving his all together in the Oscar nominated The Full Monty, as a devious Conservative cabinet member who defects to the Labour party, forces a general election, and becomes consumed by political ambition.

Associations target multiple dwellings

The Satellite Broadcasting and Communications Association and the Independent Cable & Telecommunications Association plan to work together to focus on the multiple dwelling unit market. The two trade associations will create new resources, expand educational programs and broaden their public policy efforts to help their members capture customers who live in apartment complexes, condominiums and townhouses. SBCA represents satellite TV providers and programmers, while ICTA represents private and independent cable operators.
NDS launches digital ENG gear

COFDM uses narrower bandwidth than analog and handles multipath environments

By Glen Dickson

NDS is launching a new digital ENG system at NAB '99 in Las Vegas designed to work in less bandwidth than analog microwave systems while delivering better multipath performance.

NDS's "Digital ENG" system employs COFDM (Coded Orthogonal Frequency Division Multiplexing) modulation, the same adopted by European broadcasters for digital terrestrial transmission. COFDM combats multipath interference, a typical problem in urban areas, by using multiple carriers—up to 2,000—to transmit a signal, instead of the single-carrier technique employed by analog FM modulation and digital modulation schemes such as QPSK, QAM and 8-VSB.

While COFDM was rejected by the U.S. as a way to modulate DTV signals in favor of 8-VSB, that doesn't mean it can't be used for the microwave paths that broadcasters rely on for news feeds. U.S. broadcasters are looking more seriously at replacing the analog FM technology they use today for ENG with a digitally compressed system, mainly because the FCC has plans to auction off some of the 2.5 ghz frequencies they currently use for ENG, potentially to mobile satellite providers [BROADCASTING & CABLE, Nov. 30, 1998]. Another impetus is to improve microwave performance in cities and mountainous areas that experience significant multipath interference.

Tribune Broadcasting has already successfully tested NDS's COFDM system in Chicago. Says Tribune vp/engineering and technology Ira Goldstone: "The narrower channels we potentially need to fit in, that's one issue. The other issue is if we can use technologies today to improve reception without adding any more receive sites, even though it may cost us more on the transmit end. Also, as we transition to digital TV, everything will be encoded as an MPEG signal. Can we maintain MPEG throughout the path as opposed to going back to baseband?"

Tribune tested NDS' Digital ENG system in Chicago about a month ago, taking its ENG truck to areas where analog FM systems had consistently failed to produce an adequate picture. The digital COFDM system was able to produce pictures from those same locations, says Goldstone.

"The initial results are very promising," he says. "We used an omnidirectional antenna on the roof of the truck, and we only went to sites where WGN-TV couldn't get out with an analog ENG truck. COFDM is kind of happy in a multipath environment. Here in Chicago, the problem's not signal strength, it's always multipath."

COFDM allows microwave users to trade off forward error correction (FEC) against the amount of usable megabits for video transmission within a given amount of spectrum. Lisa Hobbs, NDS's marketing manager for the Americas, says that NDS has been focusing on fitting one high-quality MPEG-2 stream in 10 to 12 mhz of microwave spectrum, a significant drop down from the 17 mhz currently used by analog FM systems. But she says MPEG-2 compression could allow a broadcaster to fit multiple signals within 12 mhz, perhaps up to four MPEG-2 streams.

Tribune tested the NDS COFDM system using a bandwidth of 8 mhz, cranked up the FEC, and still netted 5 Mb/s. "Because of COFDM's guard bands and forward error correction, you're always compromising between the guardband—how much spectrum you're using for correcting cruddy paths—and megabits," says Goldstone.

NDS isn't talking pricing yet for Digital ENG. NDS is supplying its coding, while Microwave Radio Corporation is supplying the COFDM modulator/demodulator.

Dolby unveils audio for DTV

With eight channels, system is designed as economical, in-plant format for professionals

By Glen Dickson

Dolby Laboratories has developed a digital audio technology intended for professional use by digital television program producers and DTV broadcasters.

The system, called "Dolby E," is designed to serve as an economical, in-plant digital audio format for DTV broadcasters transmitting 5.1-channel Dolby Digital (AC-3) audio as part of their digital broadcasts. Dolby E allows up to eight discrete digital audio channels to be distributed through an existing AES/EBU digital audio pair or recorded on two tracks of a digital VTR.

The idea is that broadcasters who can already support AES/EBU digital audio in their plants won't have to upgrade their audio infrastructures to support Dolby Digital. Instead, they will use Dolby E encoders and decoders to handle multichannel audio.
The Dolby E audio will then be encoded as 5.1-channel Dolby Digital audio for ATSC broadcast.

"Dolby E is a professional audio coding system that will handle everything before the transmitter," says Tom Daily, Dolby's marketing manager for broadcast products. "You can put the digital audio on a VTR tape and run it through the whole broadcast infrastructure, such as through a satellite system or a video server."

Dolby Digital encoders and decoders currently sell for $5,000 and $3,600 respectively. Daily says the Dolby E models, which will begin shipping this summer, will probably "be in the same ballpark."

Dolby E will support up to 8 digital channels so networks can include two Surround Sound (left and right) channels along with 5.1 channel Dolby Digital, allowing affiliates to use either audio format. Dolby E also survives up to 10 encode/decode cycles without degradation, allows editing in the encoded domain by matching audio frames with video frames, and supports Dolby Digital metadata.

Daily says the major broadcast networks and HBO have already responded favorably to Dolby E, which will be formally introduced at NAB '99 in Las Vegas. ABC, for example, is currently transmitting full 5.1-channel Dolby Digital sound for its HDTV movies, but is looking to move to Dolby E for its distribution feed to DTV affiliates, says Dailey.

"Right now they're using Dolby Digital at a double rate compared to the ATSC standard [ABC's DTV distribution link is 45 Mb/s; affiliates broadcast 19.4 Mb/s]," says Daily. "But we're working closely with them to have Dolby E replace what they're doing."

Daily says some affiliates may only need a Dolby E decoder until they start producing their own DTV content; networks and program producers will have a much greater requirement for both encoders and decoders. Stations will still need a Dolby Digital encoder for local broadcast.

WRAL-HD launches into HyperSPACE
Raleigh DTV station adds Pluto's new digital recorder

By Karen Anderson

As part of a major overhaul of its broadcast operations, WRAL-HD Raleigh, N.C., has brought online the Pluto HyperSPACE High Definition Digital Video Recorder for the station's 24-hour-a-day high-definition broadcast.

The HyperSPACE is at the heart of the station's 1.5 Gb/s plant, which also includes two D-5 machines, two satellite origination sources, a baseband switcher and a 480i-1080i upconverter for news broadcasts.

"The Pluto is the centerpiece because it is able to be programmed with an additional level of programming...like an automation system inside an automation system," says Luther Ritchie, developmental engineer for Capitol Broadcasting, owner of WRAL-HD and its companion analog station, WRAL-TV. "The Pluto gives us a terrific on-air look."

Station engineers worked with Philips to develop an automated interface that allows HyperSPACE to be used as a program and spot server. WRAL-HD runs no commercials, but plays short programs in their place.

The station can make "seamless" transitions within the system, Ritchie explains. "With Pluto, [WRAL-HD] looks...like a real television station."

The Pluto recorder, which CBS is also using at its four DTV stations, is a part of several other local stations, including WRAZ-HD, WNCN-TV, and WWCN-HD. Currently, WRAL-HD's antenna is on WRAL-TV's 2,900-foot tower.

The base of the new tower will house transmitters for each of the stations. A steel grating will provide ice protection for the structure. WRAL-TV lost a tower in December 1989 in an ice storm.

WRAL-HD has ordered an Andrew antenna and is considering a Harris or Comark transmitter, says John Greene, Capitol Broadcasting's vice president of special projects. Kline Tower and Steel has begun pouring the foundation and will continue construction when weather permits. Architektur, a local architectural firm, is designing the transmitter building.

Upon completion of the tower, WRAL-HD will transfer from its experimental channel 32 to channel 53 and begin broadcasting at full power.

Can’t play without a partner

With few available portals, ‘it’s like bumper cars...seeing where they can take this’

By Richard Tedesco

The current media frenzy of corralling an Internet portal partner is like a race with no finish line. Yet everyone still wants to get a risky bet down. Last week it was USA Networks’ expensive turn as it paired with Lycos, whose search engine is an Internet powerhouse. The resulting merger, valued at about $20 billion, seemed to climax a round robin of deals pairing portals with traditional media partners.

Not so, say analysts and industry insiders. It’s still open season for Internet portal plays—despite clear indications that no one has a fix on just where the Internet will be 18 months from now.

“Nobody knows how this is going to evolve,” says veteran media analyst Harold Vogel. “It’s like bumper cars hitting each other and seeing where they can take this.”

The next major point of impact seems equally impossible to predict in a race kicked off last June by NBC’s co-ownership deal for Snap with CNet.

Now fast forward seven months, where several media giants have staked their own claims on the ‘Net landscape. They have embellished the expensive patronage of Web portals, great and small, from scant millions of dollars to a whopping $6.7 billion—a statistic illustrating the volatility of a contest with no top or bottom.

Up until the USA Networks deal, the only sure constant, observers said, was that the portal players got money and media partners able to deliver more eyeballs. And from the TV companies’ standpoint, their only guarantee was that they were in the race.

While some see USA-Lycos as just another portal pairing, USA President/CEO Barry Diller’s appreciation of commerce makes it a transaction with a difference, said Bill Bass, an analyst with Cambridge, Mass.-based Forrester Research.

“All these deals are roughly the same—until this one,” he says. “Traditional media companies have not done well on the Internet. In traditional media, what wins is content. What wins on the Internet is commerce.”

Other analysts speculate that it’s the speed of the Internet’s evolution—and broadcasters’ fear of being left behind, especially in the nascent portal business—that is propelling the activity.

But long term, the outlook for similar portal plays remains cloudy. The only consensus among media observers is that more deals are likely as the ‘Net business continues to define itself.

The USA-Lycos deal “could wind up being an incredibly smart move or one of the dumbest moves in history,” says Watts Wacker, resident futurist for Westport, Conn.-based First Matter.

“The half-life of things is so short, the bet you make on technology becomes a crapshoot these days. And what the Internet may evolve into is dust.”

For months, industry analysts have come up empty in gauging the impact of deals between TV companies and Internet powerhouses. That’s because the deals—whether CBS’ alignment with AOL or Disney/ABC’s tie to Infoseek—had their own formulas based on the singular logic that the best defense was a good offense.

Wacker, for one, sees traditional media companies making future Web plays to stake turf online without risking any of their existing equity. And he foresees a massive corporate coalescing online where all companies can potentially play. “‘Eat or be eaten’ can also be the strategy of the little guy,” he said.

The Lycos deal may be a prime example of just that. As the fourth leading Web portal in terms of traffic, it was the odd man out in the wake of recent deals struck by Infoseek and Excite. “Saying you’re the number four doesn’t mean that much,” says Wacker. “The No. 44 portal could blow by you tomorrow.”

The perception is that in an increasingly competitive Web environment, the portals playing distant second fiddles to Yahoo need traditional media partners with promotional power to simply survive. “If Lycos hadn’t done this deal, it ran the risk of being out of the race,” says Bass.

Despite the $6.7 billion deal Excite struck with At Home, he says it still probably needs a traditional media “to drive traffic, and that isn’t going to be At Home.”

“There are only so many portals that will carry weight,” says Vogel, “and it’s not even clear that portals will remain portals because the whole Internet changes so quickly.”

An eventual portal shakeout seems inevitable, analysts predict. Further challenging the dominance of the Inter-net’s main ports of entry, the Web is witnessing the emergence of sites billed as niche portals, such as ESPN.com.

There can be only “a few portals at the end of the game. The market is just too fragmented,” adds Peter Krasilovsky, analyst for the Princeton, N.J.-based Kelsey Group. Krasilovsky argues that synergies between Lycos and Ticketmaster in the USA deal are exaggerated, with Ticketmaster already widely available. And he foresees newspapers getting into the portal business next.

But plenty of variations on the theme have fallen short of expectations, including the all-purpose Pathfinder site from Time Warner—another media giant prominently mentioned as a potential portal patron.

“What I think you’ll see now are portals doing e-commerce deals,” says Bass, pointing to the e-commerce aspect of the USA-Lycos deal that could help spark that trend.

USA-Lycos is a deal with a distinctive hue. That’s due to the commerce properties, particularly Ticketmaster, that Lycos draws from it. Exposure on USA Networks is a distinctly secondary part of the proposition.

Lycos’ links with Home Shopping Network and Internet Shopping Network could generate greater sales of vacuum cleaners and the like, goosing HSN’s underutilized shipping capacity in the process. “We needed a national portal if we were going to continue to grow. We needed an aggregation of eyeballs,” USA’s Diller declared, “so we could lie down these paths to commerce.”

While the resulting $20 billion market capitalization of this marriage appears impressive, it pales compared to the values Yahoo and America Online represent.

In Yahoo, there’s the portal player that could buy a TV network such as CBS, says Bass—or, better yet, Discovery—in what would be a reversal of the sort of plays seen thus far. But he thinks that move wouldn’t necessarily be in Yahoo’s best interests. “The network business is a tough business,” Bass observes.

So is the portal business, even when one lands a big partner: Lycos’s stock endured a $33 battering the day its deal with USA was announced, effectively knocking $1.5 billion off its value.

“The significance of this deal is greater than the companies involved. It finally takes the air out of the Internet companies,” Vogel said.

Download that tune - legally

By Richard Tedesco

Five major music companies will run a digital music trial with IBM on Road Runner in San Diego this spring that could accelerate legitimate access to music online.

The six-month market trial will make full-length CDs and single music releases available to 1,000 Road Runner users in an IBM system considered secure by the record labels. PC users download music to hard drives, and then transfer it to recording devices.

The object: to discourage rampant piracy of digital music on the ‘Net today by offering fast CD downloads—2 to 3 minutes in a broadband environment—that will include artwork.

Copyright protection will be carried in the system’s encryption and electronic watermarking, intended to prevent illegal copying of music once it’s downloaded. Kevin Conroy, senior vice president of worldwide marketing for BMG, calls the security “a threshold to keep honest people honest.”

Industry executives estimate that digital downloads could eventually represent 15% to 20% of music sales.

Mark Hardie, senior analyst for Forrester Research, believes digital downloads could double music revenues. And Hardie says the real-world San Diego test is an essential start: “The point of the trial is to put the technology in place to see what happens.”

Spontaneous Web creativity won’t be entirely snuffed. “A grunge band that wants to put up its music over the ‘Net, that’s legitimate goods,” says Roger Faxon, senior vice president of business development for EMI Music. “What we’re talking about here is piracy. Free is not good.”

The trial, a tangent of the Secure Digital Music Initiative (SDMI) endorsed by the major record labels last year, will likely spawn more trials followed by commercial rollouts, industry executives said.

FEBRUARY 15, 1999 / BROADCASTING & CABLE 87
Do-goober or difficult dissenter?

Bad boy or choirboy—either description could characterize Harold Furchtgott-Roth's place on the Federal Communications Commission.

During his nearly 15 months on the panel, the economist and former Capitol Hill staffer has established himself as the agency's in-house contrarian. Since taking a seat on the panel, the 43-year-old Republican has opposed or partially dissented from roughly 70 FCC decisions, earning him a reputation as the class troublemaker.

In scores of meticulously written opinions, Furchtgott-Roth thumbed his nose at those who want the FCC to impose new public-interest obligations on telecommunications companies. Likewise, he's tried to put the spotlight on "voluntary" conditions the FCC sometimes imposes on merger approvals, license renewals and other corporate actions to reveal what he says is an out-of-control agency overstepping its legal authority.

FCC Chairman William Kennard even poked fun at Furchtgott-Roth's contentiousness in a speech last fall. After the five commissioners went out to dinner to celebrate their first year working together, Kennard said, "and everything went fine until we got the bill and Commissioner Furchtgott-Roth insisted on separate statements."

On a more serious note, Kennard last week praised Furchtgott-Roth for bringing to the commission "an incisive intellect, a useful legislative background, and the valuable perspective of an economist."

But despite being at odds with his fellow commissioners on many issues, Furchtgott-Roth insists he's really the panel's do-oober and not a wild-eyed radical, hell-bent on weakening the agency's authority. "My view is that government agencies should just follow the law," he says, repeating a refrain that should be familiar to anyone following the agency's efforts to implement the 1996 Telecommunications Act.

He has voiced particular frustration with the agency's attempt to review its regulations on a biennial basis, as required by the 1996 act. Chairman Kennard has launched sweeping reviews of several major broadcast, cable, and telephone regulations, but Furchtgott-Roth says the effort falls far short of the congressional goal of reviewing all of the agency's rules and determining which should stay on the books and which should be jettisoned.

"I find it breathtaking how frequently this commission has difficulty reading the statute as written," he says. "Congress wrote a law that has a lot of deregulatory language in it," he continues. "They went to far too much trouble to have federal agencies pick and choose which elements of law they want to follow."

To show how he thinks the review should be done, Furchtgott-Roth last summer hired a team of 11 interns to review 48 telephone rules and determine whether their public benefits outweighed the costs they imposed on companies. Their conclusion: eliminate 8 rules, modify three more and maintain the other 37.

Furchtgott-Roth says his review team was not an attempt to one-up his Democratic colleagues, but to provide a constructive model for the next review in 2000.

As a conservative economist with a fervent deregulatory bent, Furchtgott-Roth seems out of place as a regulator. Indeed, in public meetings, he often seems uncomfortable delivering his sharply worded dissents. His manner is stiff and he frequently speaks so softly as to be barely audible. But despite appearances, he professes to like his job, in part because it requires a similar intellectual rigor to studying the economy.

"I enjoy being on the commission," he says. "I've learned a lot. It's difficult from the outside to have a full appreciation both for the complexity of how the commission operates and the number of issues before us at any one time."

Before joining the FCC in November 1997, Furchtgott-Roth spent two years as chief economist for the House Commerce Committee and played an integral role in drafting the 1996 Act. But he does not claim keen insight into lawmakers' intent because of his role in writing the act. "The law is to be read as written," he says "My privilege of having been close to its construction merely gives me a degree of familiarity, but no greater power to divine its interpretation."

The FCC's shortcomings in implementing the 1996 Act, he says, are due in part to the agency's long-standing practice of extending the reach of the "public-interest standard," which gives the commission power to base license and merger rulings on whether companies are operating in a way that benefits the public.

"Right now we don't have rules...it's completely seat of the pants and we've been doing it this way for years."—Bill McConnell

ABC and the National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians union remained at an impasse in their protracted contract dispute last week, with NABET seeking a return to the bargaining table in the wake of its members' rejection of ABC's final contract offer. NABET has notified federal mediators that it is prepared to sit down again with ABC representatives to attempt to resolve the two-year contract renewal tussle, according to NABET spokesman Tom Donahue. "We think the only course of action available to both parties is a resumption of talks, and it's our expectation that we'll be back at the table," Donahue said. After the union's Feb. 5 vote to reject what the network called its last offer, it's unclear that ABC has a similar expectation. "We're not improving our offer," said ABC spokeswoman Julie Hoover, adding, "We are not prepared to discuss our strategy in the press. We're evaluating the situation." ABC's offered its 1,650 NABET employees wage increases of 13% over four years: 3.5% in the first and last years, and 3% in the second and third years of the proposed pact. The network's offer sought a reduction in contributions to daily hires' benefits, a reduction in its pension fund contribution from 9% to 3% annually, according to NABET and ABC, and a switch in health benefits to Disney's plan.

Studios USA is trying to use its leverage with upcoming Law & Order renewals with NBC to land another drama on the Peacock Network, sources confirmed Thursday. Studios USA head Barry Diller reportedly wants a three-year renewal on Law & Order and for NBC to pick up show producer Dick Wolf's new offering, a Law & Order spin-off entitled Sex Crimes. The new Wolf series may also share a dual window on Studios USA-owned USA Network. Neither side was commenting on Thursday. Young Broadcasting reported a 1% drop in fourth-quarter revenues to $723.3 million, although broadcast cash flow was up 6% to $37.2 million. Analysts say the results weren’t bad, considering that Young’s flagship station, KCAL-TV Los Angeles, suffered an 18% drop in revenues in the fourth quarter, due primarily to the lack of NBA games. Company Chairman Vincent Young said the station made up almost all of the $2 million broadcast cash flow that was lost without the NBA. By March, he said, sales for the NBA should be back on track. Helping to offset last year’s NBA and General Motors losses was strong political advertising, which totaled $13.7 million, and advertising from new clients, which totaled $12 million in 1998.

The Federal Trade Commission last week approved DirecTV’s purchase of Primestar. That resolves the antitrust considerations. Now the FCC must approve the transfer of TCI Satellite Entertainment’s license, which consists of 11 channels at 119 degrees west longitude. The stockholders of both companies also must give the transaction their thumbs-up.

The U.S. Court of Appeals will not relieve satellite TV broadcasters of royalty fee increases, the three-judge panel ruled late last month. To reverse the Librarian of Congress’s fall 1997 finding that the fees should be raised, the Satellite Broadcasting and Communications Association would have had to prove that the Librarian’s decision was arbitrary. The court found that SBCA failed to prove this, although the court admits that this standard is “exceptionally deferential,” and thus hard to prove. SBCA is not likely to appeal the decision. SBCA senior VP Andy Paul said.

Rep. Michael Oxley (R-Ohio) introduced legislation that would eliminate the FCC ban against broadcasters owning both TV or radio stations and a newspaper in the same market. Reps. Cliff Stearns (R-Fla.) and Ralph Hall (D-Texas) cosponsored the bill.

Fox Broadcasting has renewed Beverly Hills 90210 for the 1999-2000 season. The renewal for a 10th season comes after Fox announced last week that another long-running Spelling Entertainment drama, Melrose Place, would not be returning.

Clarification: The article “KKYK Makes Virtual Switch,” (Feb. 8) may have had a misleading deck. It read “Little Rock station jumps from Discreet Logic/Devlin to Oral; retains Frost graphics.” Discreet Logic/Devlin refers to a Discreet Logic virtual set system that utilizes Devlin Design Group set design. KKYK has since switched to an Oral virtual set system and retained Devlin Design Group as the designer of the new set.

Saluting Stanton

Frank Stanton, for 26 years the president of CBS Inc., was acknowledged by his peers last week as “the greatest executive in the history of the television business” as well as “the conscience of the broadcasting industry.” He was honored by two fronts: the New York Academy of Television Arts & Sciences on Tuesday (Feb. 9) and the Deadline Club on Wednesday. Both presented him with awards for lifetime achievement. In response, he admonished the industry that “You have to keep desperately at it [the fight for First Amendment rights]. There is always someone doing an end-run against us. Never give up or we will lose something precious to our democracy.”

At the NATAS ceremony (seated, l to r): John Cannon, president of the National Academy of Television Arts & Sciences; Rita Hauser, of counsel to Stroock & Stroock & Lavan; Dr. Stanton; Kay Koplovitz, founder of the USA Networks; former CBS News anchor Walter Cronkite; William F. Baker, president of the New York NATAS chapter and head of public broadcasting’s Channel 13, (standing, l to r): Irwin Segelstein, former CBS and NBC programming and record industry executive; Bill Small, longtime CBS Washington bureau chief and later lobbyist; Ralph Baruch, CBS syndication executive, later CEO of Viacom; Ralph Goldberg, CBS government affairs counsel now with King World; Lou Dorfman, responsible for CBS design during the Stanton years; Mike Wallace of 60 Minutes; Corydon Dunham of Cahill, Gordon & Reindel; attorney Floyd Abrams; group broadcast executive Ralph Becker; Gus Hauser, prominent cable executive; Andy Rooney of 60 Minutes; former CBS TV Network President Tom Leahy; Morley Safer of 60 Minutes; former CBS executive George Dessart, now professor of TV and radio at Brooklyn College; Stanley Moger of SRF Media, who moderated the event, and Alan Wagner, former CBS programming executive, now a TV producer (Boardwalk Entertainment).

Microradio. The name is appealing. Like the microbreweries that have sprung up to take on the Budweisers and Coors of the world and give people endless choice among beer flavors, colors and labels. Unlike microbreweries, however, the addition of thousands of radio stations is not only a threat to market share, it also may be a threat to the integrity of the present system. To the extent broadcasters’ concern is protectionist, prompted by an old order’s distaste for new competition or the fear that an influx of stations will lower the value of their properties, they are on their own. But to the extent they are troubled by the potential interference problems posed by a flood of new low-power—and not-so-low-power—FM stations, we share their concern. And we don’t blame them for being suspicious of any assurances that the drop-ins would create no interference problems. Broadcasters cannot afford to wait until after the blow has been struck to raise their shields.

The radio industry has created some of its own image problems on this issue. The upside of consolidation is that some smaller operations benefit from the deep pockets of their new parents. The downside is that the trafficking in properties has sent prices soaring, with some stations more profitable to flip than operate. And speaking of flipping, some formats are approaching the ubiquity and uniformity of burger franchises. That climate has contributed to the stereotyping of commercial radio as an automated, homogenized machine, which in turn has helped the “microradio stations without portfolio” already on air (read pirates) play the buccaneer image to the cable audience.

The stereotype of radio is only that. There remain stations of every stripe and format, in hundreds of languages, with no scarcity of voices, or opinions, to be heard. And given the track record for creativity of the aural medium, there should also be plenty of opportunity to inject some more “micro” inventiveness into the “macro” radio world.

In any case, we doubt the FCC can drop hundreds or perhaps thousands of new stations into the FM dial without causing harm in interference to existing stations and jeopardizing tomorrow’s in-band digital service. The FCC’s primary job is to protect the integrity of the TV and radio spectrum, not to invent ways to undermine it.

Members only

Even members of the U.S. Senate must see the hypocrisy of 100 men and women who answer to voters every six years going behind closed doors to discuss the public accountability of another elected official.

Nonetheless, the Senate chose last week to depart from the openness that has largely characterized the impeachment of the president, and take one of the most important debates in recent history away from the public. We reject the analogy of these deliberations to those of a jury. Jurors are private citizens pressed into service to determine the disposition of another citizen’s liberty or property. Here, elected officials have sought from the public a position that uniquely empowers them to decide the status of the most public of elected officials.

We take some comfort from the Senate’s strong—though not strong enough—majority vote to open the debate. And while some senators will release their statements into the Congressional Record, and others released them in the congressional hallways, in those instances, the senators were controlling the information, not letting the public into a process that, presumably, belongs to them. What the senators fear, apparently, is their own conduct, their own play to the cameras. Not surprisingly, their cowardly solution was not to change their actions, but to hide them.
