Radio on Guadalcanal . . .

IN THE last war our fighting forces had no direct means of contact that brought them news from other war fronts. But in World War II radio keeps them informed of daily happenings on the other side of the globe.

Thousands of miles from their homeland, hemmed in by steaming jungles, the U. S. Marines on Guadalcanal listen eagerly for news on Russia's progress, the second front in Europe, and production activities at home, reports Technical Sergeant James W. Hurlbut, Marine Corps combat correspondent.

When the broadcasts end, the men drift off in little groups to analyze what the day's developments will mean in the progress of the war. The din of artillery often backgrounds these "bull sessions," or heated arguments are cut short as the men are called to sudden action. But interrupted or otherwise, news by short-wave transmitters in the homeland give the Marines on Guadalcanal a clear idea of what their fighting means to the world as well as to themselves. They know what they are doing and why they are doing it. And they realize this even more keenly when they talk to Japanese prisoners who don't know where they are or whom they're fighting. Brought to Guadalcanal in the holds of transports, they were dumped on the beach and told to start fighting.

But don't think that war is the only topic of conversation among the Marines. It isn't. Like all Americans, they talk of sports, food, the dramas, comedies, and good band music that comes to them via the short waves. They even grumble a little, because their pet Hollywood glamour girl, Lana Turner, went and got married. —The Editors.

Eddie Cantor's Routine for Laughter Wows Servicemen
When He Gives Forth With
It at Hollywood Canteen

BORN with the rare gift of being able to make folks laugh, Eddie (Banjo Eyes) Cantor's routine may not be the newest in the world but he still packs a wallop into the ridiculous hand-clapping, skipping gag shown above at the Hollywood Canteen. That, plus his rapid-fire ad-libbing, sent servicemen into gales of laughter.
Not only does Eddie spend every moment he can spare at this morale-building fun-house but he also rounds up other entertainment for the men. Christmas, he played Santa Claus at the canteen, and supplied a gift for every serviceman who visited the place that day. And Dinah Shore, his right-hand radio girl, was there, too, doing her share to make the day a happy one for the men. Eddie's been in show business a good many years, and the fact that he can still bowl audiences over is a tribute to a hard-working guy and a real comedian!

Europe's Black Market

This Warner Brothers-First National Film Portrays Graphically the Heartbreak and Lost Hope That Existed Among Refugees Who Tried to Escape Hitler's Hell

THE story from which the film "Casablanca" was made is a page torn from life as it was lived by those who made an attempt to escape through the narrow doorway so closely guarded by the Gestapo.

No matter what their circumstances before reaching French Morocco, human life was held cheaply in Casablanca. Once refugees managed to brave the dangerous trail across the Mediterranean, they arrived to find that passports were made available only to those with influence or with money to grease the palms of corrupt officials.

Lieutenant Robert Aisner, technical adviser on the picture, lends stark realism to the scenes. He served on the Maginot Line, and his was one of the French units that refused to surrender. When he finally escaped from a German concentration camp, he made his way to America via the same route shown in the film.

Ingrid Bergman, hunted by the Gestapo, gives a grand performance. And Bogart, in his first romantic lead, shows amazing finesse.

Altogether "Casablanca" is an outstanding picture, but one that will leave you saying, "Thank God for freedom—and America!"

Kenny Won't Be Simple Any More!

Kenny Baker, Star of Monogram's "Silver Skates," Tells Why He Isn't on the Airlanes

THE many radio listeners who have wondered at Kenny Baker's absence from the airlanes, since he closed with Fred Allen on the Texaco show, can now be answered.

It isn't because air programs are closed to Baker and his splendid singing talent. The real reason is Kenny refuses to play the role of fall guy and dimwit any longer on the radio, feels that it is opposed to his work as a singer.

"I'll let someone else be the fall guy," said Kenny when he was interviewed between scenes on the "Silver Skates" set. "I want to go back on the air, but on a program where I can be myself in speaking lines as much as I am when I sing."

Being continually cast as an apparent simpleton on radio programs, Kenny is convinced, works to his disadvantage when it comes to securing good screen parts; and his goal is success in both fields.

With the "Silver Skates" role, his twelfth in pictures, Kenny is confident that he can go places in more dramatic film portrayals. So it is to erase movie producers' idea of his talents, gleaned from radio Simple Simon roles, that he is staying off the air until he is given an opportunity to "play a straight part" in keeping with his talents as a singer. Mr. Baker's ultimatum is, "I won't be simple any more. I'm a plain guy myself, but I don't want people to forget that, as an actor, I can play other parts."

REMEMBERED on the airlanes as the singing star of the Texaco show, Kenny Baker's had any number of radio offers since he left the program, refused them because radio scripters didn't seem to think he could play any but a dimwit role. As star of film "Silver Skates," above, and left with skating star Belita, Baker will prove air writers erred

A FIEND for work when it comes to practising a song until he gets it just right, Kenny has several hobbies. He goes in for chemiculture (growing plants in chemically treated water), fishing and swimming, plus being a bug on color photography. Pictures right are indicative of the way an unexpected visitor finds him at home

"Duffy's," you know, is Ed (Archie) Gardner's hilarious Tuesday night show on the Blue Network. The truth is the show attracted such large crowds it had to be moved to the largest studio in Radio City.

If you're fortunate enough to get

Then there's Miss Duffy (Shirley Booth), the cashier; Eddie (himself) Green, the waiter, and Archie's friend Finnegan (Charlie Cantor). And if you can't see the show in person, it still adds up to one of the brightest new comedy spots on your dial.

Cast: Dennis Morgan, Irene Manning, Bruce Cabot, Victor Francen, Lynne Overman, Gene Lockhart, Faye Emerson, Marcel Dalio, Felix Basch, Gerald Mohr, Noble Johnson, Curt Bois, Albert Morin, Jack LaRue, William Edmunds and Wallis Clark. Dennis Morgan in "Desert Song" role of sheik

Type of Picture: Sigmund Romberg's operetta in Technicolor with a new background.

Movie-Goers Can Expect: The same high adventure plot, with its many exciting thrills and encounters, but in a considerably modernized manner. Dennis Morgan's fine voice, which originally got him into pictures, is heard to advantage. It's by far his best role to date, should establish him as a star. "The Desert Song" also rediscovers Irene Manning. The whole cast spent two months on the desert near Gallup, New Mexico, which gives film real flavor of authenticity. For a time the sandstorms were so bad that Dennis and Irene had to wear smoke-masks to protect their throats from sands in between scenes. But when you see—and hear—they in the picture you'll probably agree that the results justified effort they made.

Verdict: Good music and high adventure combine to make a fine picture.—Family.

ROY ROGERS

Both Horse and Rider
Scored a Hit on Tommy
Riggs-Betty Lou Show

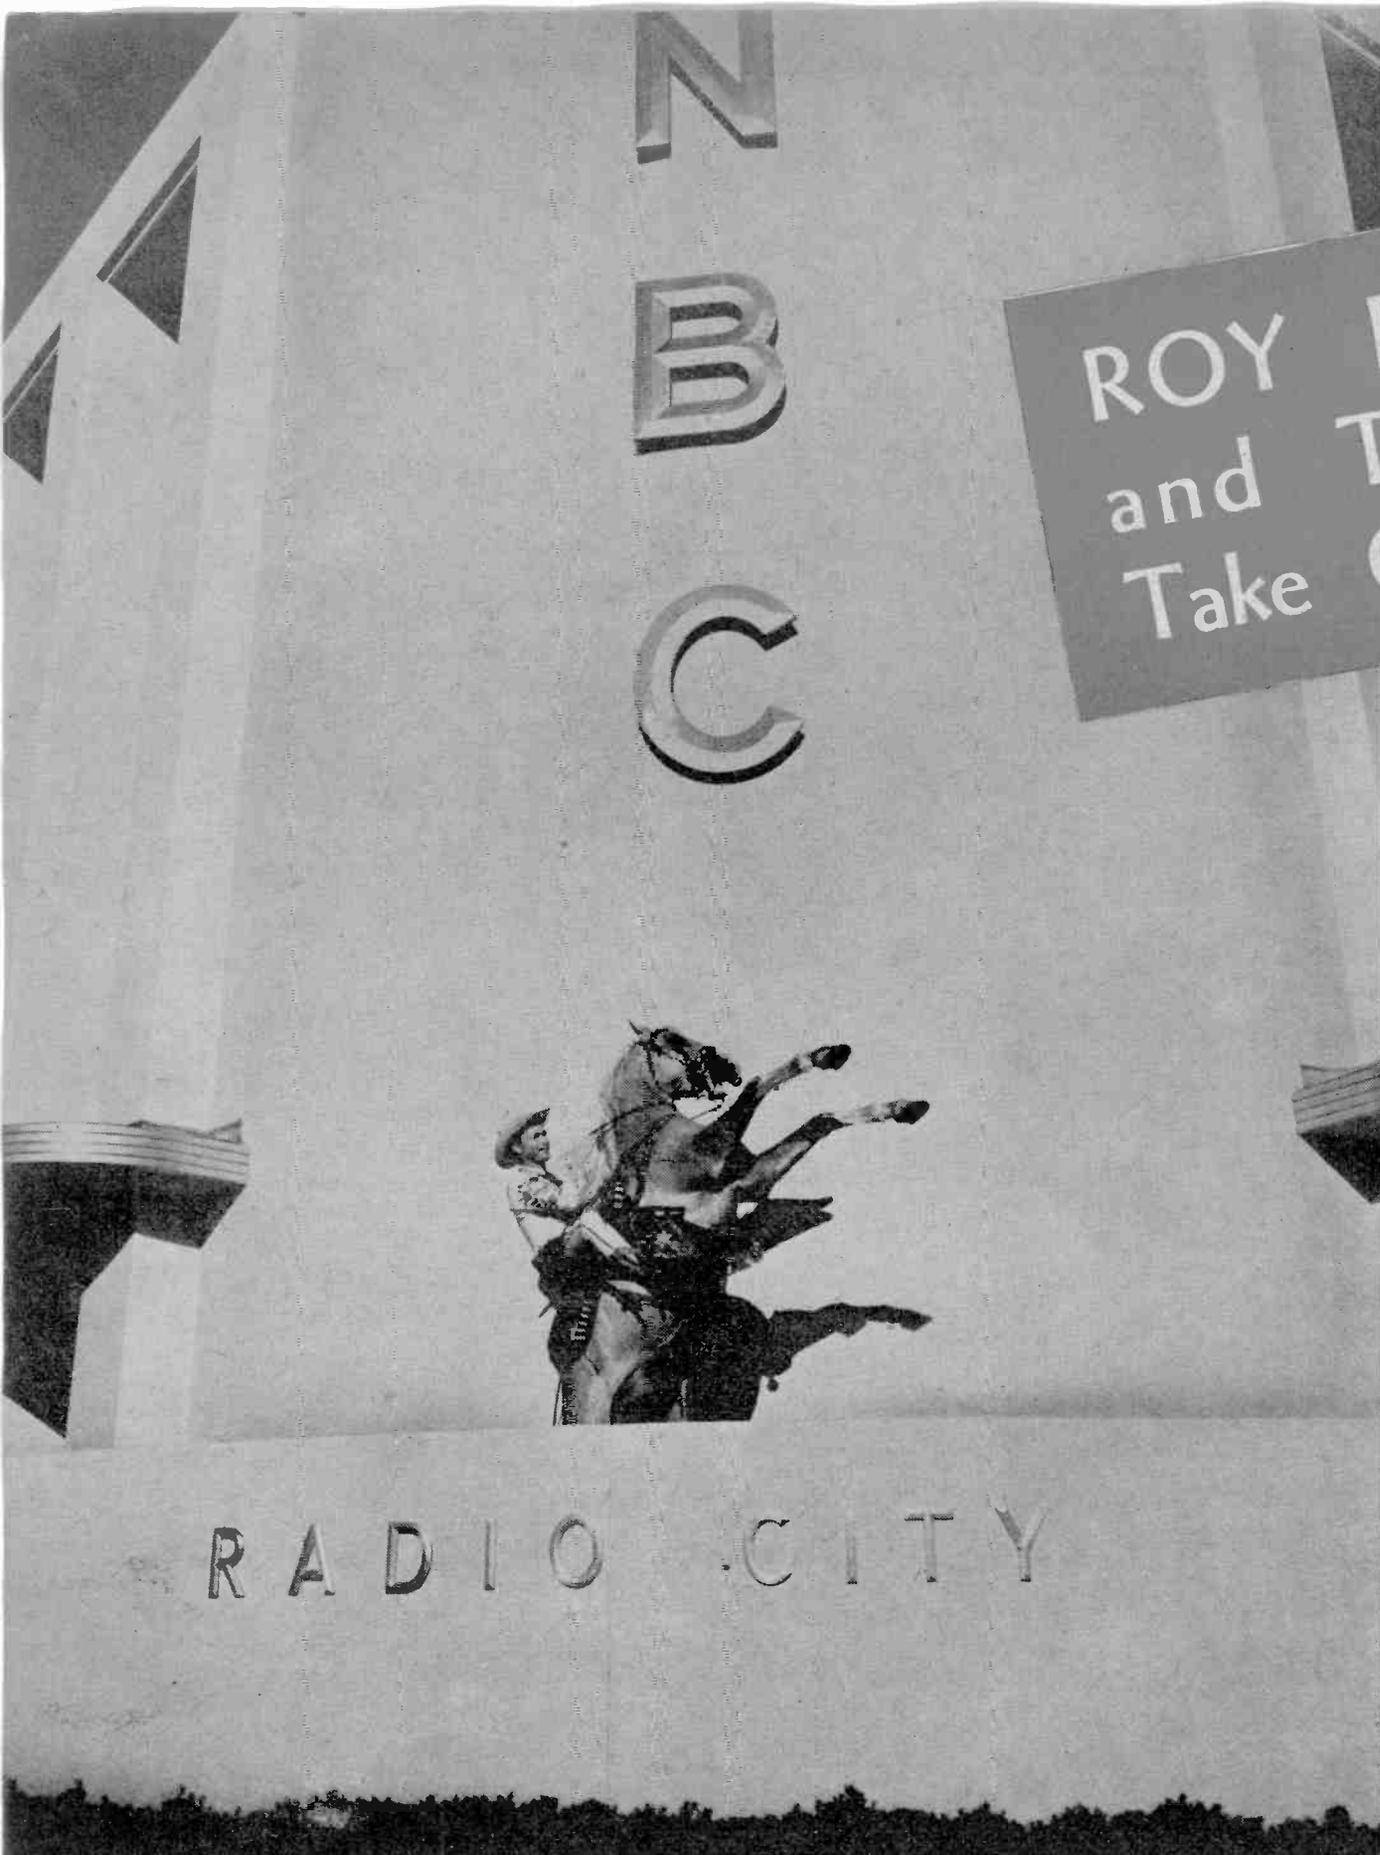

WESTERN star Roy Rogers and his equally famous horse Trigger count their movie fans in millions. And their guest-star appearance at Tommy Riggs and Betty Lou NBC show won radio listeners, too.

Trigger is accustomed to cameras grinding while he performs, but the little black box—the microphone—was something entirely out of his line. But did he balk and snort? Not at all. He simply looked a little surprised and took it in stride; in fact, Trigger wasn't nearly so surprised—and astonished—as the studio audience when they saw a horse prance onto the stage. He went through his routines without missing a cue.

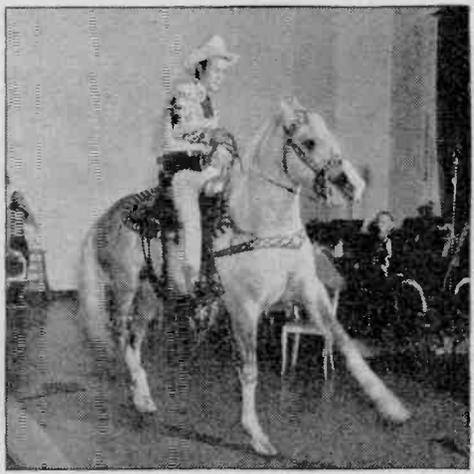

Just returned from a six-week personal-appearance tour with rider Rogers, Trigger had so many hairs plucked from his mane by souvenir hunters that it will take some time for it to grow back to normal. But he still looked like the grand actor he is when he took over NBC for a guest-star appearance with his famous master.

ROY ROGERS' horse Trigger was first equine actor ever permitted to enter NBC studios in Hollywood and appear on a radio program. Left: Before show

An open letter to Mr. Exceptionally Handsome Bachelor (a prince of a fellow, jovial and witty, seeking a partner to share bungalow):

Dear E. H. B.:

Better scratch the name of Betty Lou Gerson off your list. True, she's attractive, but on that bungalow business I'm afraid you'll run into trouble with a big, red-headed chap named Joe Ainley. He's a radio producer here, and, incidentally, her husband. Besides someone was just playing a joke on Betty Lou when they submitted her name to the Lonely Hearts Club.

P.S.: Y'see Betty Lou's star of "Lonely Women"—but don't let that fool you . . .

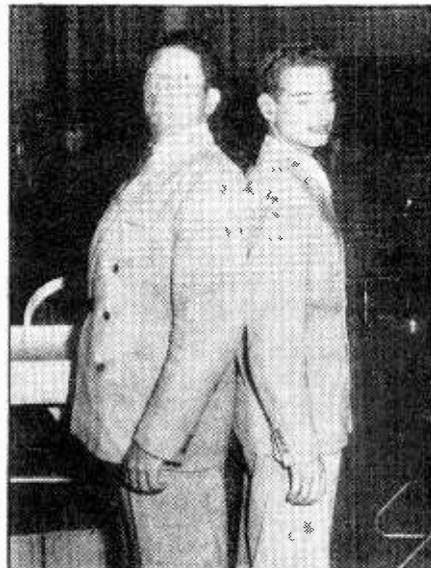

Barrymore has given in his "Mayor of the Town" broadcasts have so intrigued his listeners that they want to see as well as hear him. And the way things look now, the many fan letters have brought results. For negotiations are under way at the moment and M-G-M may star Barrymore in a "Mayor of the Town" motion-picture series . . .

If we hadn't seen it with our own eyes, we wouldn't have believed that

A taxicab that never was anything more concrete than a sound-effects gadget is a war casualty. For more than a decade Mr. First Nighter has started that program off by taking listeners for a spin around Times Square in his mythical cab. Last Sunday night, to keep in tune with the nation's rubber conservation program, Mr. First Nighter arrived at "The Little Theater Just off Times Square" on foot. So ended for the duration one of radio's oldest traditions.

So real has this opening "First Nighter" sequence been that hordes of New York visitors have searched high and wide for the make-believe "Little Theater Just off Times Square." And when queries from listeners came in too great numbers to be answered by personal reply, MBS had a postcard printed explaining that the "Little Theater" really wasn't real . . .

Sidelines: Betty Ruth Smith ("Lone Journey," "Helen Trent"), recently described by Varga as "the radio actress with the most beautiful eyes," is apartment hunting with Lieutenant Robert Zech, U. S. N. They'll be married—but soon . . . A merchant seaman gave "Barn Dance" comic Pat Buttram a new version of the now famous "Sighted Sub, Sank Same." It's "Sighted Sub, Glub, Glub!" . . . Twelve-year-old Jack Chalbeck, of "Lone Journey," is showing off his handiwork, a thirty-inch model of Ken Griffin's racing sloop Revenge. Jack got the idea when he served as crewboy on the Revenge during two Mackinac races. It's complete to scale and no kid stuff.

BOB BURNS' SON, Robin, Jr., now member of Army Air Forces, measures up to Pappy. "He just grows on me, y'know," says Bob

FRITZ REINER CONDUCTS THE NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SUNDAY, CBS

Marian Anderson Guest of "Telephone Hour" Monday, NBC; Fabien Sevitzyk Presents Radio Premiere of Alvin Etler's "Symphonietta"

By ROBERT BAGAR

New York World-Telegram Music Critic and Associate Program Annotator for Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York

FRITZ REINER, regular conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, appears as guest batonist of the Philharmonic-Symphony for two weeks. Mr. Reiner has often conducted the great American orchestras, as well as numerous great ones abroad. He is one of those specially gifted musicians who are at home either in grand opera or concert music. No mean distinction, you can wager.

Fritz Reiner, born in Budapest on December 19, 1888, studied piano and the rest of the book at the Budapest Academy of Music. When he was graduated—with high honors—he took the post of conductor at the Budapest Opera Comique. One year later he moved over to the Laibach Opera, where the repertory was of wider scope.

Between the years 1911 and 1914 he functioned as director of the Dresden State Opera, besides leading symphonic concerts whenever he was given the opportunity. He proved so proficient at both that he became an important personality—and at a youthful age. Mr. Reiner carried on with his work in Europe for the next few years and in 1922 he came to this country to become the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony, a post he held until 1931.

The distinguished batonist, in the meantime, had been considerably active as an educator, which experience, together with a natural executive ability, culminated in his appointment as head of the orchestra department of the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia.

That city proved one of many opportunities for him. He led concerts of the Philadelphia orchestra, besides those of the Institute orchestra. In addition he led the German repertory of the Philadelphia Opera Company.

In 1933, Mr. Reiner accepted the conductorship of the Pittsburgh Symphony. And under his authoritative guidance that orchestra has made remarkable progress.

Mr. Reiner's first Sunday broadcast with the Philharmonic-Symphony offers a program consisting of the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony, the polka and dance from Shostakovich's ballet "The Golden Age," the Tschai-kowsky "Italian Caprice" and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

The Prokofieff Symphony, called "Classical" because of its Mozartean mold, instrumentation and occasional flavor, was given its first performance in Leningrad on April 21, 1918. The composer conducted. The following December he directed his own work in Carnegie Hall at a concert of the Russian Symphony Society. That was the American premiere of the symphony.

The Shostakovich "Golden Age" music comprises the last two pieces from a four-part suite. The polka, which has the general spirit of a performance by a village band, is folkish and amusing. The dance keeps up with the rusticating—modern Soviet style.

Someone has called the Shostakovich ballets, of which there are three, the "musical indictments of the non-Soviet man." That, possibly, may be an idea stated in reverse, for, as I seem to gather it, Shostakovich's works are meant to be musical laurels for the brow of the Soviet man.

All that need be said of the Tschai-kowsky "Italian Caprice" is that it is one of those occasional pieces he liked to toss off. The music is attractive in a mild manner.

Moussorgsky wrote his "Pictures at an Exhibition" for piano after the death of his intimate friend Victor Hartman, a painter. The work, so rewarding in richness of imagination and melody and so utterly clever, was transcribed by Ravel, one of the greatest orchestrators of all time.

Altogether there are ten sections to the piece, each corresponding to a Hartman picture. The sequence known as promenade, which slides in and out of the music is supposed to represent Moussorgsky walking back and forth, as he examines the pictures.

(The Philharmonic-Symphony, conducted by Fritz Reiner, plays the above numbers during its broadcast over CBS on Sunday, January 17.)

Music From Indiana

Fabien Sevitzyk and the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra will present

FOR THREE DECADES famous orchestras in Europe as well as in the U. S. have responded to Fritz Reiner's masterful baton the radio premiere of a "Symphonietta" by Alvin Etler of the Yale University School of Music. The rest of the program consists of the second movement from Sibelius' Second Symphony.

Regrettably I have not been able to get any information concerning Mr. Etler's composition in time for this article. Like every other watcher of the musical skies I am interested in new works. But I promise to listen to the broadcast and discuss it in a later issue of MOVIE-RADIO GUIDE.

As for this lone movement of the Second Sibelius, one can say what may be said of the whole symphony; that it is impressive music, sometimes derivative, sometimes fiercely original. Georg Schneevoigt, eminent Finnish conductor, once referred to the second movement from this symphony as one that teems with patriotic feeling.

(Fabien Sevitzyk and the Indianapolis Symphony perform the second movement from the Second Symphony of Sibelius and the Alvin Etler "Symphonietta" over CBS on Thursday, January 21.)

Marian Anderson and Her Art

Few singers today have been so universally acclaimed by press and public alike as Marian Anderson, the distinguished Negro contralto. Not too many years ago, perhaps less than a decade, Miss Anderson was struggling along, wondering where her star would lead her. She began her studies in this country. She even gave a couple of recitals. But she went to Europe for further training and it was in Germany that she first attracted attention.

Today she is known as one of the finest interpreters of the German Lied, which, you will agree, is something to boast about. But Miss Anderson is equally at home in the classic compositions for voice, as well as in many of the delightful French lyrics. Of course, she is a past mistress of the art of singing spirituals.

Miss Anderson sings "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice" from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," the Chaminade "Summer" and a spiritual, "Ev'ry Time I Feel de Spirit."

(The "Telephone Hour" broadcast, starring Marian Anderson, is scheduled for Monday, January 18, over NBC.)

Scheduled

Arturo Toscanini, directing the NBC Symphony Orchestra, continues the Brahms cycle: Serenade No. 1 in D Major (Allegro Molto). NBC, Sunday.

"The Voice of Firestone," with Margaret Speaks, soprano, offers "On the Trail" from "Grand Canyon Suite" (Grofe), "Summertime" (Gershwin), "Gold and Silver Waltz" (Lehar), "Siboney" (Lecuona), "After Long Absence" (Sanderson), "Pavanne" (Gould) and "Sing! Sing! Sing!" (Sacco). NBC, Monday.

Duke Ellington's jazz knocks on concert-hall door

DUKE ELLINGTON, noted Negro composer, pianist and orchestra conductor, is by way of entering the concert hall. On January 23, he and his orchestra (augmented) will present a number of his compositions, including a major novelty in three movements.

For twenty years Mr. Ellington has been supplying just about the best jazz this country has known. He is recognized here and abroad as a composer of soaring imagination and sincerity.

It has long been known that Mr. Ellington's dance compositions were the products of collaboration between himself and his men. But this new work is all his—themes, development, orchestration.

The collaboration business brings up an interesting point. Some might say that the numbers he did with the band could not properly be called his own. The idea is, however, that he worked with his musicians as some very famous composers have worked with instrumentalists. Brahms, for instance, while laboring on his violin concerto, was not ashamed to ask for advice from well-known violinists.

When Mr. Ellington collaborates with his men it is the getting together of kindred souls. Most of the thematic ideas and the development sections of his pieces, of course, are his own. The orchestral colors of this highly gifted band, though, come about after much discussion among the musicians.

From what I have heard concerning this new Ellington magnum opus (up to this point, of course) it should be a humdinger. Musicians whose judgment I respect have come with tall tales of another and greater "Rhapsody in Blue." This one, fittingly, is in different shades, with three sections, titled "Black," "Brown" and "Beige."

Duke Ellington's recordings, which have won a wide public in England and France, as well as elsewhere on and off the Continent, remain among the best made by any American jazz ensemble. They show conclusively why that is so. First of all, one finds great unity and finish in the playing; secondly, there is always logic to everything; thirdly, you can be sure to find inventiveness of an uncommon order, and I mean inventiveness in the instrumentation, over and above that implicit in the piece itself.

So we'll wait for this newest experiment. Jazz again goes knocking at the concert hall door. History does repeat itself, you know.

RADIO WAR REPORTERS SHARE FORTUNES OF WAR

By JAMES G. HANLON

Looking Back

WE CAN now look back on U. S. radio's first year of war. The experiences of the men who have covered for us the important news developments on the fighting fronts present an interesting, though sketchy, chronicle of how the war has progressed in 1942. In NBC's year-end report, it is ably summed up in this one sentence: The fortune of war reporters followed the changing tides of war.

From the Philippines to Singapore, to Java, to Australia, to New Guinea, to North Africa the reporters followed to cover the news. As the United Nations suffered losses, so did war reporters. When the Philippines fell, the correspondents fled, were captured, were killed. And when the United Nations finally swung to the offensive, the reporters went along side by side with the troops. Let's look at some of the highlights in the record:

In Tokyo Dick Tenny (NBC), about to enter his studio on December 7, 1941, was seized and imprisoned. He was repatriated months later.

Likewise from Berlin, John Dickson (MBS) managed to get back to the U. S. safely.

Cecil Brown (CBS) went down with the British warship Repulse in the South China Sea in December (1941). Later, when his broadcasts from Singapore were barred by British Military Intelligence for being "pessimistic," he went to Australia.

In Manila Bert Silen (NBC) and Royal Arch Gunnison (MBS) were captured by the Japs and Don Bell (NBC) is believed to have been killed.

Sydney Albright (NBC) fled from Java to Australia, just a step ahead of the Japs.

Elizabeth Wayne (MBS) moved out of Dutch East Indies when the Japs moved in, managed to get safely home after a hazardous around-the-world trip.

When U. S. Rangers and British Commandos attacked Dieppe on August 19, John MacVane (NBC) went along, aired an eye-witness account the following day. MacVane "disappeared" again in November, turned up two weeks later with American troops in North Africa. His first broadcast from Algiers was on November 14, just a few days after the landing.

That's just part of the record of radio's war reporters so far. We've followed the reports of these courageous correspondents through the dizzy, trying months of 1942. They've given us on-the-spot news from the hot spots in this global war, keeping just a few steps ahead of the enemy to do so. As a well-deserved gesture I think we ought to tip our hats to them for their fine work.

Reporter's Views on Britain

When I met Alex Dreier it was 9 a.m. and he'd already been at work five hours. He had the tired appearance of a bookkeeper returning to his job after a physically strenuous two-week vacation. His first remark when we got around to talking about his trip to Britain was, "I certainly want to go back and I intend to go back!"

"The news-beat in London right now," he explained, "is one hundred times more fascinating than it is either in New York or Chicago. There you have the feeling that you're on the ground floor where things are happening. And although you can't use ninety-nine percent of the stuff you get, for military and political reasons, it's a thousand times more thrilling. The British are very fair in their censorship. Sometimes it's strict and at other times, comparatively, you wonder if there's any censorship at all."

Alex Dreier, the reporter, looks like an all-star tackle who has gone a little soft at a desk job. At first glance, you'd never pick the man with the chubby, boyish face for the experienced newsman that he is. But behind all this you discover, before the conversation has gone very far, that here is one of the cleverest news-gatherers on the radio front.

Mr. Dreier, you know, was in Britain at the time the African invasion

"I WAS THERE!" was the proud boast of Cecil Brown on that fateful day when the Japs torpedoed and sank Britain's "Prince of Wales" and "Repulse." A few hours after he was rescued from the oily waters (above), the world learned all the graphic details in his CBS report from Singapore took place. "For weeks prior to the invasion," he reports, "you could feel that something big was brewing. But nobody knew what was going on. In Britain it was a better kept secret than it was in our own Washington."

"When the news broke in Britain of the landing of U. S. troops on African soil, nothing that has taken place before or since did as much to cement the feelings of the two nations."

Conditions in Britain, he claims, are very much better than they were in Berlin when he was there. (He was one of the last U. S. newsmen to leave Germany.) "The British are eating one hundred times better than the Germans," he continued, "and, although Berlin's blackouts are blacker than London's, their underground air-raid shelters are far inferior. In London the underground shelters are built deeper underground."

But for British radio entertainment he brought back no praise. When he asked a U. S. Army officer what it was that American soldiers in Britain missed most, he answered: "On Sunday night at home you could sit down to several hours of swell radio entertainment, but here the ———— programs are terrible." Everybody, even the British, he claims, listens to such American programs (which are rebroadcast by the BBC) as "Command Performance."

"British radio is in a rut," says Alex, "and the BBC won't let it get out."

Dreier's description of the BBC's attitude toward newscasts should interest listeners in this country. He described it thus: "This is the BBC. Here's the news. We're a government monopoly. You can take it or leave it."

And we beef at what we get . . .

Ann and her motorscooter. Transportation problems have reached the acute stage in the Hollywood neck of the woods where Ann Southern lives, so Ann's taken to riding to market on her motorscooter. Not only that but she has formed a "shopping pool" with her neighbors, and each one takes turn at the daily chores . . .

Celebrities were missing. Betty Hutton turned the tables this year in Hollywood. Instead of a swanky party on New Year's at which all the "proper" people appeared. Betty threw her Quipster king is Froggy Laughlin, ten-year-old player on the M-G-M lot. A member of "Our Gang," the script of Froggy's new picture called for him to be lowered into a well on a hook-and-rope contraption. To put Froggy at ease, the director called, "How's everything down there, Froggy?" Replied Froggy, "Okay, I guess, but I'm within an inch of kicking the bucket!" . . .

Bang bows out for duration of Veronica Lake's present picture chore at Paramount in "So Proudly We Hail."

Veronica plays a nurse in the U. S. Army, and her usual headdress is against the rules of "no hair touching the uniform." But anyway she does her hair, la Lake is still a knockout. And we're sure that movie-goers will agree when they see her in this one . . .

Jottings from Movietown. Ten years ago Charles Boyer, now one of Hollywood's highest-paid actors, made his American screen debut playing a chauffeur bit part . . . Dick Powell, who does such a swell job in "Happy Go Lucky," has a fine collection of antique guns that has to be securely nailed to the wall of his den because son Norman, now eight, is developing exploring tendencies . . . Catherine Craig (Mrs. Robert Preston) has gone back to movie chores now that Bob's in the service, will play secretary to Ginger Rogers in "Lady in the Dark" . . . Little Ann Rutherford of Andy Hardy fame is now, if you please, Mrs. David May . . . Rin-Tin-Tin's grandson has quit films and gone to war in a DFD unit . . . FCC ADDS NEW FREQUENCIES TO U. S. INTERNATIONAL SERVICE

CBS' Short-Wave "Listening Station" Helps Spike Axis Propaganda; Boston Symphony Concerts Rebroadcast to South American Listeners

Moscow, Then and Now

ACCORDING to Lev Kassil, renowned Soviet author, conditions in Moscow are vastly different than they were a year ago. Then, workers, office employes, engineers, actors, artists and professors were hurriedly drilled in civilian military detachments. Workers' battalions marched through the Moscow streets to take up positions on the defense lines. The city's boundaries bristled with steel rails, barring every entrance. Anti-tank traps and barriers girdled the suburbs. Machine-guns were hastily placed on housetops on the outskirts of the city. Every stone was armed, every street corner a fortress, every roof threatened the enemy with doom. The city had the appearance of an immense war camp. Tanks thundered through the streets on their way to the front lines. Herds of cattle were driven across the Moscow squares to feed the army in the field. Automobiles, street-cars and trolley-buses waited patiently at the crossings for the herds to pass.

Now Moscow is as intent, as deeply war-minded as at that time. But a majestic calm now pervades the life of the city. Moscow is not as festive as she was before the war, but the wounds inflicted upon her by last year's air-raids have long since been healed. The newcomer will not find any trace of the barbarous blows struck by the air pirates. Demolished walls have been rebuilt, the gaping holes in houses repaired. The city's immortality is embodied in the unshakable grandeur of the buildings that have risen from the debris.

The capital is still ruled by severe martial law. It is still silent and deserted at night; the silence broken only by the patrols of the city's commandant. But the capital is dear to Moscovite hearts as it is—austere, reticent, blacked-out, intent.

FCC Adds Frequencies

At the request of the Board of War Communications, the Federal Communications Commission has allocated two additional frequencies to the United States international broadcast service for the duration of the war. These two frequencies, 7.805 and 7.935 megs (both outside of internationally assigned short-wave broadcast bands), will also be utilized by zone and inter-zone police stations, upon the express condition that these stations do not interfere with the international broadcast service.

U. S. concentrating on voice broadcasts. During 1942, 33,500 short-wave broadcasts from forty different points of the globe were recorded, transcribed and translated—a total of more than seventy million words. Very often in this torrent of words, much of it Axis gibberish, is a "propaganda line" being developed by enemy stations—a pattern of thought that can be traced through a series of broadcasts covering weeks or months. When that pattern becomes definitive, the CBS short-wave listening-station hoists the danger signal in translations and analyses sent to editors of newspapers, topical magazines and wire services. Paul W. White, director of CBS public affairs, points out: "It is important to know what the enemy wants us to think. If we know, we can act accordingly. For the CBS news organization feels that it can help to dispel impressions that Axis propaganda might otherwise be successful in spreading."

Boston Symphony to South America

NBC International Division is sending to Latin-American audiences a series of concerts by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the programs emanate from Symphony Hall, Boston, and are rebroadcast to Spanish listeners on Wednesdays from 11:00 p.m. to 12:00 mid. over WNBI WBOS, WGEA, WGEO and WRUW. Portuguese listeners hear the noted orchestra on Thursdays from 6:00 to 7:00 p.m. EWT over WRCA and WCBX. The broadcasts of the NBC Symphony concerts and the Metropolitan Opera performances to Latin America are also meeting with wide approval among the listening audiences. Both the symphony and the opera are short-waved each week by the Spanish and Portuguese sections of the international division of NBC.

From My Short-Wave Note-Book

(Berlin)—A Berlin speaker quoted a dispatch from Stockholm as stating that Darlan's murderer would not be named until after the war, as it might help the Axis cause. "It is obvious," stated the Berlin commentator, "that the Allies had Darlan done away with" . . . (London)—According to military commentator Major Lewis Hastings, the Soviets have already overrun an area, formerly held by Germany, as large as Switzerland; have destroyed ten or twelve Nazi divisions in this area, and the Germans have had to draw heavily on their Caucasus troops for reinforcements . . . (London)—A speaker on "Radio Newsreel," discussing French Somaliland (recently joined to the French-Allied cause) stated that its one major city was Djibouti; a good natural, modernized port of considerable strategic importance since it is only 150 miles from Aden, Arabia; the two cities jointly controlling the approaches to the Red Sea and the Suez Canal. Djibouti's population is about twenty thousand, of which fifteen hundred are Europeans; mostly French . . . (Moscow Radio)—In the liberated village of Peskovatka, Stalingrad region, inhabitants stated that the Hitlerites shot many collective farmers. They forcibly drove young girls into soldiers' brothels. Shortly before retreating, the Germans drove to the rear fifty families of collective farmers, all of them old people, women and children. They were compelled to travel on foot, thinly dressed and without provision for food . . . (Melbourne)—According to a Melbourne newsman, marvelous work is being done by Army doctors in New Guinea. He stated that delicate cranial and abdominal operations have been carried out by the light of kerosene lamps and flashlights. Stripped to the waist, dripping with perspiration and enveloped in a foul smell of slime, the doctors toil sometimes eighteen hours a day, and yet wounded men carried from these crude operating arenas have as much chance of recovery as they would have in modern hospitals (over ninety-eight percent of the wounded that reach American field hospitals are saved) . . . (Melbourne)—A war correspondent told about the treachery of the Japs. In the Buna fighting they repeatedly called the Americans "yellow" in an attempt to get them to advance into concealed machine-gun traps. He told also how one first-aid assistant bandaging a wounded man heard a call, "Hey, Medico . . ." When he advanced toward the direction of the voice, he was shot in the back by a sniper.

Soundman's Headache

If the technicians and soundmen on CBS are walking around with slightly wacky grins on their faces, it's because Colonel Stoopnagle is back on the air with his "Stooperos." The Colonel has brought with him a whole host of mad and miraculous inventions and the boys in the sound-room are still trying to figure some of them out.

Writes Bomber Song Music

Paul Taubman, pianist on the Mary Marlin program, has just finished writing the music for the official Bomber Command song. It'll be released this week.

THE REMAINDER OF THIS WEEK'S PROGRAMS FOLLOWS ON PAGE 23

THE roar of the plane's motor was even, monotonous. The wind hummed outside the cabin and the air inside became stuffy, soporific. Steve Harper, his blue eyes red-rimmed from lack of sleep, looked off into the darkness ahead. He was not a pilot, but he was piloting this plane fleeing through the night from France and captivity. If only Collins had not been hurt, if only he could remember what Collins had told him about the gasoline . . . but Steve, whose sensitive hands played across the controls he knew only from observation as an air-force gunner, was first of all a musician . . . his ears registered the sounds around him . . . he dreamed . . .

The motor sputtered, stopped abruptly. The shrieking of the wind became a high howl . . . the plane, a machine without a master, spun crazily downward . . . downward . . . downward toward the English Channel.

There came a piercing, siren-like scream as the wind tore against the falling plane . . . then a crash . . . and silence . . .

Chapter I

IT WAS the end of another day at the Marshall Publishing Company in New York. Linda Harper, Steve's lonesome wife, sat alone at her desk looking out at the dusk which had settled suddenly to veil the city's harshness and to kindle a million small twinkling lights. It was a nostalgic moment that struck Linda's eyes with its magic, causing tears to cloud their gray-green depths. Her heart was filled with longing.

In the soft lights of the office, Linda's brown hair looked darker against her fair complexion. Although she was 28, Linda looked like a little girl as she sat there in a white blouse with a Peter Pan collar and a dark business suit. Her tiny feet were curled back under her chair, the tips of her toes barely reaching the floor.

Steve dwelt in Linda's heart, but another problem disturbed her mind. Was she right in remaining on as Clyde Marshall's assistant? She had decided only this morning that she would stay, telling a rather surprised Grace Marshall what her decision had been. Grace, a well-preserved blonde of about 34, and attractive in the sophisticated, lacquered manner, was Clyde's sister. Linda knew she had touched Grace's heart that morning—if such a thing were possible.

But Linda mistrusted Grace. The older woman, Linda knew, was selfish, self-centered and had a bad habit of toying with other people's lives.

From a discussion of Linda's problem, Grace had brought up the growing disintegration of Walter Owens as a writer. Poor Walter! Big, clumsy, good-natured Walter, who always dressed in rumpled clothes and talked in his frank Texas manner. Linda knew it had been Grace Marshall who had come between Walter and Ann and that it was the resulting divorce that had left Walter a writer without words, a life without direction. Linda had suggested to Grace that Walter needed Ann now, that only their reunion would be his salvation.

"Nonsense," Grace had replied in her cool voice. "Nobody needs anybody! People have certain talents or they don't. They do something or they don't do it. It has nothing to do with other people. The test of anybody is the ability to live alone and work along!"

Linda was too kind to point out that Grace had insisted she remain at the Marshall Publishing Company for Clyde's sake. Yet why, Linda asked herself, should she continue working for a man who had professed his love to her when he knew her life was wrapped up in her husband's.

Linda had seen Clyde that afternoon after her talk with Grace. His face, with its trim mustache, looked pale and drawn. Linda realized the doctor had been right in saying that Clyde was critically ill. His well-cared-for hands were restless in his lap as Linda talked to him. He argued with her in his strangely gentle manner, his words smooth and liquid with a cultivated accent. Clyde, knowing Linda was making a sacrifice, asked her to leave the job if she was doing it against her will and out of pity for him, because, as he expressed it, he had a "bum ticker."

But could she have done differently? Linda told Clyde that she liked her work—Clyde once had told her she was the best manuscript reader he'd ever known—and she felt she was good at it and for him to stop worrying about things like that and get well. Only Linda could measure the cost of the decision she'd made.

Linda knew that back home in Axminster, 30 hours by train west of New York, her father would be in a welter of worry if he could know what she'd done. George Emerson was suspicious of New York and mistrustful of the people who lived there. That's why Linda's mother, Irene Emerson, was here in New York right now, waiting at Linda's apartment. Linda's family wanted her to come home—come home and live with Axminster friends while she waited for Steve. Her father had sent her mother to bring Linda back.

But Linda knew she couldn't wait in Axminster. She had tried that before without success. In the small town of 25,000 souls where everyone, it seemed, knew everyone's troubles, she had fought against the sympathy of family and friends. All had believed Steve never would return alive. None had Linda's faith that Steve was alive and well. True, it was months since the War Department had reported Steve missing somewhere over the North Sea or northern France while on a reconnaissance flight. Others, though, had been reported missing and later found. Why not Steve? Linda knew in her heart that he lived. She accepted nothing else.

She roused herself now from her reveries, opened her purse and dabbed a powder-puff against her nose, repaired the shape and color of her well-formed lips, snapped her purse shut and turned out the office lights. She must face her mother now and explain why she was staying on in New York. She hoped her mother would understand.

Irene Emerson was about fifty years old, with fading, light-brown hair. She was good-looking in an unpretentiously middle-aged way. She had a nice figure, and with the help of her daughters, Linda and fifteen-year-old Holly, she managed to look quite chic and modern. She was, however, unreconciled to Linda's remaining in New York.

"But," Linda argued that evening when she arrived home, "it would be criminal of me to leave now, Mother."

"I'm not so sure of that. From everything you've said, it's perfectly clear that Clyde knows what he's done. You can't deny that you were practically forced into taking this job."

"But, Mother, I've known Clyde for a long time. He's been a good friend to me and to Steve. And if my working for him was important to his health—there was nothing else I could've done."

"It's not your fault, Linda, if Clyde isn't a well man." Mrs. Emerson took off her spectacles and wiped them with a handkerchief. "You mustn't do things that you wouldn't normally do just because you're afraid of hurting him. Good heavens, Linda, if people were to stop doing things they ought to do because of pity—"

"It isn't pity," Linda hastened to say. "Clyde doesn't need anybody's pity."

"Linda! Linda! You're getting yourself into a lot of unnecessary trouble. I have nothing against Clyde. I always thought he was a very charming young man. But you've got no business working for a man who said he's in love with you."

"I just want him to get better."

"Well, I assure you, he'll get better a whole lot sooner without you around." Mrs. Emerson paused, replaced her spectacles and took up her knitting. Linda remained silent, watching her mother. Mrs. Emerson spoke again.

"And to think I laughed this summer when your father said that Clyde Marshall had a very special interest in you. The older I get, the more I learn to appreciate him. Now, listen to me, Linda. You write Clyde a nice letter, tell him that you finally decided to go back home, and everything will be all right, I assure you."

But Linda's mind was made up. She promised to come home as soon as Clyde was back on his feet again. Mrs. Emerson realized there was nothing more she could do.

Linda realized the argument was over. Her mother would return to Axminster alone and she'd go on waiting for Steve in New York. She wondered what Steve would want her to do in the situation. Later that evening, after her mother had retired, Linda, with her throat thick and her eyes brimming, yielded to an impulse to write Steve another letter—a letter never to be addressed, a letter to be sent into the void like a prayer . . .

"My Steve," she wrote, "wherever you are, I have a feeling this will reach out to you now, find you for me, tell you how much I love you and how wholly I live for you. I am here in New York, my husband, waiting for you, knowing that you will come to me, somehow . . . sometime . . ."

The small apartment was quite hushed when Linda had finished her letter. She pushed it aside at her desk and, abruptly sobbing, she buried her face in her arms.

"Oh, Steve . . . Steve . . ."

Chapter II

THE big, white Emerson home stood on a corner in Axminster. The towering maple trees in the yard long since had turned golden and red, then brown as the leaves fluttered down on the dying lawn. The flowers in both back and front were reduced to black stalks from the late frosts and the glassed-in porches in front and rear were kept closed against November's chilly winds. Frequently now George Emerson found a cheery fire glowing in the huge fireplace in the living-room when he returned home at night from his work at the Emerson Department Store, the largest store in Axminster, a fact that made George inordinately proud.

George Emerson was a big man. He was six feet tall and broad-shouldered, with a slight middle-age paunch. He had dark hair, graying at the temples, and black, shaggy eyebrows gave him an air of distinction. He was handsome in a meaty, mature sort of way. His family took first place in his heart and, after that, came the store. At the moment he was worried about his elder daughter, Linda, and irritated at the absence of his wife, who had gone to New York to bring Linda back.

Fifteen-year-old Holly Emerson was doing her best to make up for the absence of her mother, but the sudden departure of Carrie, the Emerson housekeeper, had put an extra strain on Holly. Not that she complained. Indeed, she dramatized the situation. But there was a wind-blown look to the breakfast-table and a bright flush on Holly's usually merry face when her father sat down that morning.

George Emerson, setting down his cup of pale tepid coffee, noticed the flush in time to cough down a comment on the state of the household. Holly, proud of her culinary achievements, was cheerful.

"Kinda funny-looking for an egg, isn't it?" she asked, nodding toward the brown-and-yellow-looking mess on her father's plate.

"Well," he said not unkindly, "we could pretend that you meant to scramble it."

"That's what I did mean to do," said Holly.

"Oh—that makes it all right then," Emerson said uncertainly.

"That awful-looking brown stuff's just where it stuck to the pan," Holly explained.

Emerson grinned ruefully. "Now that you mention it, I guess I've been getting in a kind of rut about eggs." He coughed. "The house is sort of in a mess since Carrie left. I wish I knew what to do. I don't want your mother to worry about us and come home. I want her to stay in New York until she brings Linda. Well, maybe we can get straightened around a little before your mother comes back. I'll ask around to see if we can find a new housekeeper."

But Holly told him she'd already asked everywhere and so far as she knew there was only one person available.

"You know somebody who might come?" Emerson asked in surprise. "Who is it? Get 'em right away."

"But I'm not absolutely sure she'd come," Holly said, frowning. "It's just pure coincidence that I thought of her. Her name is Blissful—"

"Now, Holly, don't go off like that. What's her name?"

"No fooling, Dad. That's her name. I call her Bliss although her full name is Blissful Day and she's a very talented colored woman—"

"Talented?" Emerson raised his eyebrows suspiciously.

"Yes," said Holly, "but no real ambition. That's why she didn't go back to New York. But she made the most wonderful cook last summer."

"Where did she cook?" George was skeptical.

"I didn't say she cooked, Dad," Holly laughed. "She played the part of a cook in several things in the summer theater—"

"A stage cook—well, I must say—"

"But she knows all about how a cook should act," Holly hastened to say, "and I think we can get her. Of course, now she's had this theater experience I think we'll have to be terribly charming to her to get her to come. But I can find her after school and let her look you over and—"

"Let her look me over!" Emerson stopped stirring his coffee and looked across the table at Holly.

"Is that what you said?"

"You have to be a realist, Dad. You know perfectly well it's a desperate situation. Of course you can let Mother come—and find Carrie gone. Mother's a sport. She'll just go to work. And—"

Holly stood up abruptly, looking wildly at the clock. "I've got to hurry, Dad." She took one last hasty gulp of coffee and then began throwing on her hat and coat. "I'm late for school. I'll look up Bliss this afternoon and have her come over to look us over. Good-by, Dad."

Holly ran to the front door which slammed behind her. George Emerson looked wryly at the dirty dishes on the table, sighed and rose from his chair.

"If only Irene was home," he said, putting on his coat, preparatory to going to the office. "But if she brings Linda back, well—"

Chapter III

STEVE HARPER lay with his eyes closed in the quiet of his small hospital room over in England. He had regained consciousness after an operation on his hand and now was trying to forget how it all happened—the crash and his rescue by a patrol boat.

He wanted to forget how he, a gunner, had to pilot the plane when the Nazis wounded Collins; how, when the fight was over, he rode through the night, hearing the hum of his motors, hearing, in his exhaustion, the theme of the last music he had written, forgetting until it was too late to switch to the reserve tank.

His right hand was in a splint and he couldn't get any sensation in his fingers. His commanding officer stopped to see him that afternoon, and said it probably would take time for Steve's hand to heal.

"Not too long, I hope," Steve said. "I'm anxious to be back in it, sir."

"Of course you are, but—"

"Excuse me, sir. But I'd like to tell you something about . . . that you don't know about the crash. You see, sir, it was my fault. I had to take over the controls when Lieutenant Collins was wounded—"

"You did that?" the major asked. "Why, that's remarkable. Have you ever done any flying?"

"No, sir, but I've seen enough of it . . . and he . . . he gave me instructions while he could talk . . . and I could have done it, if only—"

"If what, Corporal?"

Steve's voice broke in anguish. "If—if only I'd remembered to switch her to the reserve tank . . ."

"Now look here, Corporal. You've nothing to reproach yourself with. You did more than most men could."

"No, sir," Steve argued stubbornly. "All my life, I'll want to make up for it. I might have brought her in safely—if I'd kept my head."

"Nonsense, Corporal. You're a good soldier."

"I'll be one yet," said Steve, "or bust trying."

The major cleared his throat and looked Steve in the eye. "I've got a really tough assignment for you," he said. "I don't think you're going to like it."

"Don't worry about that, sir," Steve hunched himself up in bed and the major came over and put his hand on Steve's shoulder.

"All right, Corporal. I've just been talking to the surgeon who took care of your hand. The tendons and nerves have been cut at the wrist. I understand that you're a musician. It will be a long time before you will be able to use your hand as you would need to. It is therefore necessary, Corporal Harper, to return you to civilian life to make room for an able-bodied soldier. Immediately upon your discharge from the hospital you will be returned to America."

Steve heard the commanding officer. But the words had no meaning for him for a long moment. It was only in the silence that followed that he sensed them tearing like shrapnel into his heart. He'd never have a chance to make good his mistake—the mistake that he believed had cost Collins' life . . . and it was all because of his music . . .

Chapter IV

IT WAS a very lonely, uncertain daughter that Mrs. Emerson left behind in New York. Having seen her mother off at the train, Linda Harper hurried to her office and found Grace Marshall waiting for her. Grace had a manuscript she wanted Linda to take out for Clyde to review with her, and Linda, panic-stricken for a moment, would have given anything in the world to refuse going to the Marshall home.

Grace took a chair at the side of Linda's desk. She selected a cigarette from her case and lighted it carefully.

"Linda," she asked, "why don't you speak out? What are you afraid of?"

Linda's voice was cold. "I'm not afraid of anything, Grace. I'll take the manuscript and go."

Clyde was as gentle as ever. He talked to Linda about her hopes for Steve, about her loneliness for Axminster and home. Linda said she lived now only to hear from her husband.

"There would never be anyone else for you," said Clyde, gently probing, "no matter if—"

"Don't, Clyde," Linda pleaded. Then, more firmly, she said, "There could never be anyone else."

"Never is a long time," Clyde said contemplatively. "And yet—and yet, I'd be willing to wait myself, Linda . . . for you . . ."

"Clyde, please—"

"You wouldn't forbid me the comfort of—of dreaming, would you, Linda? That is, just as long as you are sure that I know that it is just dreaming?"

At last the day was over and Linda Harper walked back to her apartment, trying desperately to calm the doubts and fears that had crowded her day of work. She remembered Grace Marshall's pointed question: "What are you afraid of?" and Clyde's talk of waiting. New York was hollow and mocking without Steve to hold to.

In contrast, Linda thought of the warm house in Axminster, of the firelight dancing in Holly's eyes, of the smell of her father's pipe and his bantering sternness, of her mother's gentle voice. And, thinking of these things, she came at last to the door of her rooms. On the floor, just inside, was a telegram.

Linda picked up the yellow envelope almost in a panic, clutched it and, hardly breathing, tore it open. It was from the War Department and read:

WE ARE GLAD TO INFORM YOU THAT CORPORAL STEVE HARPER, HERETOFORE REPORTED MISSING, IS SAFE THOUGH WOUNDED, IN A HOSPITAL IN ENGLAND.

Linda read the telegram with hungry eyes. Then, as though they already had waited too long for their release, violent sobs convulsed her slender body as she lay silently face down on the hotel bed, yielding to her joy as she never had yielded to pain. After a time the sobs became only deep, happy sighs.

Then, because she had no one else to share her joy, Linda called the Marshalls, asked if she could come to their house to see them. She hurried through a toilet to make herself presentable, then caught a taxi outside the hotel.

GRACE met Linda at the door and ushered her into the living-room. Linda was walking on air. She hardly noticed the mirrored panel that reflected the quiet elegance of the room, the flowers in a huge Mexican glass bowl, the soft radiance of the lamps. She came immediately to Clyde's chair.

"Hello, Clyde," she said, still excited. "You look fine. I—I couldn't wait any longer to tell you!"

"It must be something tremendous," said Grace. "I've never seen you like this, Linda."

Linda could contain her news no longer. She waved the telegram and the words burst from her pretty lips. "Steve is alive! Look at this. I got this only tonight."

Grace took the telegram and read it aloud. Clyde looked up at Linda's shining eyes.

"Linda!" he exclaimed.

"Isn't it wonderful," Linda cried, sobbing a little. "I keep getting that first wonderful feeling about it over and over . . ."

Grace, as usual, was cool. "You've always maintained Steve was alive, Linda. This shouldn't surprise you—only confirm your belief."

"I know," Linda said. "I'm just—just unbearably happy."

Clyde took Linda's hand. His voice was quiet. "Of course you are," he said.

Grace settled back in a chair where she placed a cigarette to her lips, lighted it and inhaled deeply.

"And you aren't going to worry about—about anything else, I hope, until you hear definitely." Her voice had the same coolness that was characteristic of her, but Linda felt now there was something almost hostile in its tones. Grace continued speaking. "It might be—well, Steve's been missing so long. I mean, about the sort of injuries people sometimes suffer during war."

"Don't mind Grace, Linda," Clyde made a deprecatory gesture. "We Marshalls have a tendency to be morbid."

"Under other circumstances," Grace commented sharply, "I would be described by my fond brother as being simply realistic."

"Grace!" Clyde's cultured voice was almost angry.

Grace's words—and worse, her inferences—were like a cold hand on Linda's heart. As she left the large, luxurious home of the Marshalls later that night, she was almost afraid of these two people who had been so kind to her. And, without knowing it, she quickened her steps as though she were running away from something.

Chapter V

THE sun had set and the sky was mother-of-pearl. Linda Harper, very slender and trim in the brown tweed suit she had selected so carefully for this occasion, braced herself against the wind as she stood a little apart from the crowd at the airport.

It was several hours since Linda had received word from the War Department advising her to meet Steve at the airport at 6 p.m. Now she looked eagerly at the great sweep of northeast sky and her eyes filled with tears. She had meant to touch up her lips, to tuck in a stray of wind-blown hair to look her very best for Steve, but she couldn't tear her eyes from the wide, promising space from which her husband was coming back to her.

Linda didn't question that he would come, nor did she consider what mark he might bear after his desperate war experience. She didn't think of how they would take up the raveled threads of their life again. She knew only that he was coming.

She saw the tiny speck in the northeast sky that was the plane. It became larger and she heard the roar of its motors, saw the silver monster skimming to a landing on the field and watched anxiously as it taxied across the field. The hours of waiting before now seemed short compared to the endless minutes during which the passengers cleared the customs.

At last she saw him, pressed forward to throw her arms around him and hold him close.

"Steve . . . Steve . . ."

He held her close and his voice broke a little. "Oh . . . darling. Linda, don't cry, dearest."

"I'm not crying—not really crying."

Steve held her away from him at arm's length and looked at her with starved eyes.

"Look up at me, Linda." He paused. "You're still mine, aren't you? All mine?"

"All yours," she said and her eyes were shining.

"All yours forever. And I'm going to stop being silly in a minute." Abruptly she paused as her eyes found his injured hand. "Why, Steve, what's happened?"

"Nothing," Steve said quickly, almost curtly. "It doesn't matter."

"Tell me."

"Later, dear."

"Is it badly injured, Steve?" Linda's voice was quiet.

"It doesn't seem like anything," he said. "Come, Linda, stand here—yes, like that—now let me look at you."

Linda stood before him, her eyes about even with his shoulders, but looking up into his face. "Oh, Steve," she said, "I can't quite believe that you are here."

"No," he said somewhat grimly, "I can't either."

Linda caught the strange inflection in his voice. "You—you wanted to come, Steve?"

"I—I wanted to be with you," he replied. "But the fight's not done—I feel rotten about—"

"Why, Steve?"

"Never mind. No—we won't talk about it. Not now. Let's get out of here. Put your arm here in mine—tighter. Now, don't let go of me again—ever. Let's find that taxi."

Two hours later, in the quiet of Linda's apartment, Steve and Linda still were lost in the wonderment of their reunion. Nothing seemed to matter to Linda now that her husband was back. But, in some ways, Steve was different—not quite himself.

"You're so good to me, Linda," he said, holding her close, "you almost make me forget."

"Forget? Forget what, Steve?"
"Don't," he said sharply. "We—we're not going to talk about it. Just to hold you like this again, Linda—it—it's something."

They were seated on the davenport and Linda's head was on Steve's shoulder. Steve caressed Linda's soft brown hair with his uninjured hand.

"It should be enough," he said, "for me having you again. I don't want to make it hard for you. But I've got to tell you—sometime."

"Don't worry about anything, darling. Just keep very close to me so I'll know that you're really here. Everybody is eager to see you."

"Please, Linda," he begged, "let's not see anybody. Not for a long time."

Linda laughed. "I think anything would suit me now, Steve. We won't make a plan in the world until you come down to earth." She paused. "But I've kept the biggest and best news of all, darling."

"What?"
"The story of the symphony—your Park Music. It was played at last by the New York Symphony and—"

Steve pushed Linda away from him a little. He spoke tensely. "Please don't," he said. "I don't want to hear about it."

"Steve!" Linda cried incredulously.

Steve breathed deeply and when he spoke Linda was shocked at the intensity of his feeling. "Linda, I'm through with that sort of thing—see? You must drop it. I don't want to talk about it. I don't want to think about it."

Steve stood up and began pacing the small room. He lighted a cigarette, took a few hurried puffs and smashed it out in a tray.

"Well," he said at last, "I'll tell you. Maybe it'll be easier after you know. I've hated the thought."

"Oh—my—my dearest." Linda's voice broke and Steve went on, apparently with great difficulty.

"We got away from the Nazis in a plane. I had to take the controls when the pilot was shot. He told me to watch the gas—to switch to the reserve tank. Then he passed out. I got dopey—crazy. Kept thinking about the way to orchestrate Night Bomber. Well—that's all. I didn't switch to the reserve tank. I crashed the plane. The pilot's dead. I'm through, see? I can't even try to make up for it. I can't do anything to get clean and square with the world again."

"Poor Steve," Linda was all sympathy. "Is—why did they send you home, Steve?"

"They call it a medical discharge—on account of my hand. It's no good for a gunner."

"It's not—not because of the crash?"

"No," Steve replied bitterly. "They insist there was excuse for that. I was fagged—no food, no sleep. They say I wasn't a trained pilot anyhow. They had the doctors check and they found that the pilot died of wounds. I didn't—kill him. I told 'em that I could have killed him in that crash, but they're very decent. Wouldn't see it that way."

"Of course not," Linda agreed tearfully.

"But," Steve objected, "you know and I know—that if I'd been on the job, that plane wouldn't have crashed."

"What's wrong with the hand? Will it—"

Steve looked contemptuously at the bandage. "Something about cut tendons and nerves. I don't know what it means. They say—some day, maybe—" He groaned. "Oh, Linda, I don't know how I can take it, or how you can. I only know that I don't want to hear music, or talk about it, or even think about it."

He held her close and she tried to lose herself in his arms, but the discovery that her husband was even more wounded in spirit than in body blighted the rapture of the reunion for Linda. The hour to which she had looked forward had become like a perfect flower withered at the edges by a winter night.

As she gave of her strength and purpose to Steve, Linda remembered the beautiful and simple words of the Bible:

"Two are better than one. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow."

Chapter VI

THE pale sunlight of a pleasant Sunday morning poured between the rust-colored drapes of the Emerson living-room windows. It polished one of the brass andirons at the fireplace and brightened a patch of the funny paper at George Emerson's feet. It slanted across Irene Emerson's lap, striking small shafts of light from the wedding ring on the hand that held a letter from Linda.

Irene was not looking at the letter, but off into space and her eyes were filled with tenderness. George Emerson watched Irene in silence for a time. Finally he spoke.

"Aren't you pleased?" he asked. "I think it's very sensible for Linda and Steve to come home to Axminster."

"Yes—yes, very sensible," Irene said absent-mindedly. She smiled. "Of course, I'm pleased, George. I was just thinking about silly things."

George noticed tears in Irene's eyes. He raised himself from the davenport, pushed aside the Sunday paper and came over and put his arm across his wife's shoulders.

"Why—why, darling, you're—aw, now, Irene, this is something to be happy about."

"I'm happy," she said, "terribly happy."

"And there you go blubbering like a baby because Linda's coming home."

Irene wiped her eyes and made a face at George. She became serious again and thoughtful. "It will be lovely . . . having her home again. But there was something in the letter—something that bothered me a little." She unfolded the letter and started skimming through it again. "Let's see—"
"Oh, now, Irene, don't go trying to find something to worry about."

George had walked away from Irene's chair. He stood by the fireplace filling his pipe, tamping the tobacco home into the bowl with his thick thumb.

Irene looked up at him. "Here it is," she said. She began reading the letter. "Steve has been wounded in his right hand—"

George interrupted impatiently, "It could have been much worse than that." Irene disregarded her husband.

"—and it will be a long time, the doctors predict, before he can be useful as a gunner in the Air Corps. He is impatient to be back in the war and we must all try to help him believe that things are not so bad for him." Irene looked up from the letter again. "That's the part. Where she says, 'Make him believe that things are not so bad for him.'"

"Well, what's wrong with that?" George asked. "That's natural, isn't it?"

"I don't know," Irene said, frowning. "It sounds as though Linda were being cheerful and brave about something that worried her a great deal."

George struck a match and took three or four tentative puffs at his pipe. "It sounds all right to me," he said. "It says right out he's impatient to be back. That's all Linda means. Now, if she had my worries—"

Holly came into the living-room. Her face was flushed and happy. She flopped carelessly in a chair across from her father. Irene told her they'd heard from Linda and that Linda and Steve were coming home. Holly took the letter from her mother and read it quietly while George stood up again and began pacing the floor. Holly looked at her mother after she had finished reading.

"Gee," she said, "her letter sounds kind of sad." George snorted. "Sad? Sad about coming home? Not a bit."

"Maybe, Dad, she's sad about something else. Maybe she's sad because she doesn't want to leave New York. Maybe that's why she doesn't set a date for when she's coming. Maybe she doesn't want to set a date because she isn't too definite about coming. What is there in Axminster for Linda and Steve—except us?"

GEORGE did not answer Holly's question, nor did he permit himself to be disturbed by it. But Irene wondered whether Holly had not, once more, cut through the problem which they might all have to face. Would Steve, upset and wounded from his war experience, find contentment in the small town? What had the war done to him? But Irene dismissed Steve and Linda from her mind and looked at George.

"There was something you said a while ago, George, about your worries. What is it that's bothering you?"

George puffed his pipe belligerently. "We're going to have a sale at the store on Saturday. Can't get enough extra clerks to handle the merchandise. That's all. People are buying and we could get a lot of business done if we could only get the sales-people to wait on them."

Abruptly, Holly stood up. "Dad, I'd love to work in a store. Can't I work on Saturday—just on Saturday?"

"Nonsense." George grunted. "The store's no place for you."

"Why not?" Holly asked with some spirit. "It's a good place, isn't it?"

"Now, Holly—"

"What reason do you possibly have for saying no?"

"I have a lot of reasons. You're too young, for one thing. Even by the calendar, you're only fifteen."

"Things are different in war-time, Dad. Fifteen counts, then. People grow up faster—and look, Dad, how right I was about Bliss. Hasn't she made the most wonderful cook for us?"

"Listen, I'm not going to have—"

Irene broke into the conversation. "Let's think about it, George."

Holly was eager. "I'll be glad to think about it, Mother . . ."

Irene Emerson suspected Holly would think about it. She knew that Holly was easier to lead than to lock up. It was for that reason that she had urged her husband to modify his prohibition. What Irene did not suspect was that Holly thought for only one brief moment before acting.

Chapter VII

LINDA HARPER, puzzled and worried about Steve's mental reactions to his war experiences, believed it best that they leave New York. She, herself, was lonesome for home and she believed Steve might find peace of mind and forgetfulness of his bitterness in the quiet of Axminster. The decision to leave New York, however, was not made without much thought. There still was Clyde Marshall's illness to consider, but after all Clyde must know that Linda couldn't stay on at the Marshall Publishing Company forever. He had to face that fact sometime and, to Linda, the present was the time. But she broke the news to Grace first of all, and Grace was immediately distressed.

"Oh, Linda," she cried. "Have you definitely made up your mind?"

"I think so," Linda replied.

A look of calculation came into Grace's eyes. "I can't help thinking it's a mistake," she said. "If I'm any judge of Steve's condition, dragging him off to Axminster would be the worst possible thing for him."

"But," Linda protested, "I'm not dragging him off to Axminster."

"Oh, aren't you? Is it he who wants to go?" Grace paused. "Linda, it isn't my business, I know, but I can't see you and Steve make this kind of mistake without speaking to you."

One of Grace's greatest faults was her pose of frankness. She made it a point always to tell others the blunt truth—her version of it.

"Why do you think it would be a mistake for Steve?" Linda asked.

"My dear," Grace said smoothly, "the reasons are pretty obvious, aren't they? Look at him."

"What do you mean?"

"He's rather—oh—restless, isn't he? Darling, other people will pretend not to notice, or they'll be hypocritical and polite."

"What are you hinting at, Grace?" A note of antagonism had come into Linda's voice. She shuffled the manuscripts on her desk in an absent-minded fashion and a spot of color came into her cheeks.

"Hinting?" Grace's voice was flat. "I didn't realize I was being so subtle. I am trying to be honest. What I mean is—that you'll have to be very careful in making your plans. I don't think Steve will take easily to being buried alive—even with you. I don't think Steve likes Axminster, does he? Has he ever liked it?"

Linda looked out the window and hesitated before replying. "No," she said slowly, "no, he hasn't, but—"

"And yet," Grace continued, "you think he wants to return there. Now when his fame and fortune and a promising career all lie waiting for him in New York."

"Steve isn't looking for fame and fortune right now," Linda's voice was sharp. Grace casually lighted a cigarette. She laughed slightly in her cultured manner.

"Well, of course, it's none of my business," she said, "if you want to be with your parents in Axminster and you think Steve can take it. But, Linda, are you afraid to analyze your feelings: What is there in that small town for Steve? Can you think of anything that isn't a miserable waste of his talents?"

Grace crushed out her cigarette abruptly and rose from her chair. She walked out of Linda's small office without saying another word. Grace always knew when she had said just enough.

Linda was distressed. Grace had raised some questions that were unsettling. She tried to do her work conscientiously that morning, but found her mind wandering as she read a dull manuscript. Walter Owens, in a rumpled tweed suit, came in and Linda welcomed him eagerly. She knew she could talk to friendly Walter, who had suffered much because of Grace's interference in his life. Linda told him how Grace had upset her plans for taking Steve to her home.

WALTER'S shaggy brows drew close together and his bright blue eyes flashed suddenly with a fire that Linda never suspected in the warm-hearted Texan.

"Grace!" he snorted. "Why, Linda, you wouldn't let Grace influence you—"

"No," she said slowly, "but she said some things about Steve's being buried alive . . . that kept coming back . . ."

"Nonsense! Nonsense! Nonsense!" Walter ran a hand through his unruly hair. "So Grace Marshall is interested in what you and Steve do. Hmm, that's bad . . ."

Linda might have been more disturbed had she heard Grace discuss her with Clyde that evening in the spacious Marshall living-room. There was a mixture of malice and pity in Grace's manner as she announced the news to Clyde that the Harpers were planning to leave New York. If Grace expected her brother to be surprised into betraying his own feelings, however, she was disappointed.

Clyde looked up from his comfortable chair and sighed. He loved Linda but long ago had resigned himself to suppressing his feelings for her. He knew that she never could love anyone except Steve. He knew that he could do nothing to keep either Linda or Steve in New York. He loved Linda and liked Steve and wanted them to do the thing they thought best. He was startled when he heard Grace say:

"It doesn't give us much time."

"Time for what?" he asked.

"To change their minds."

Clyde closed his tired eyes. "You can't possibly influence Linda, Grace, and neither can I. What's more I wouldn't if I could."

Grace shifted herself to a more comfortable position in her chair and smoothed her skirt. "That's where we differ, Clyde. You want the same things I want, but you lie down and whimper because you can't get them. I go into action."

Clyde opened his eyes and looked narrowly at his sister. "Just what do you want of Steve and Linda?" he asked.

Grace inhaled her cigarette thoughtfully. "I'm not sure yet," she said with dreamy eyes, "but I know that the Marshall Publishing Company will be missing a good bet if Steve doesn't write his story for us."

Clyde's cultured voice was mild. "You don't usually struggle so hard for business reasons, Grace."

"No," she said slowly, "I admit that isn't all, but that's all I'm prepared to talk about."

Clyde moved slowly forward in his chair as though making ready to get on his feet. A tiny frown crossed his face.

"Look here," he said abruptly, "you're not—no—"

Grace smiled at her brother. She blew a cloud of smoke toward the ceiling. Her voice was low, smooth, steel-like.

"Thank you, Clyde, for the benefit of that doubt. I know perfectly well what you were going to say. You were going to say that you hoped I was not interested in Steve Harper and then you decided that it would be too unkind an assumption even for a brother to make. Well, I'm not sure. When you get to be my age and life has offered you so little in the way of the deepest satisfactions—you're willing to explore further possibilities."

Chapter VIII

STEVE and Linda tried to cultivate their love as though it was a garden where no weeds of misunderstanding must grow. But, as with most people who love each other deeply, so with Steve and Linda. Each one would live wholly by the needs of the other and yet not voice his own. And so there were rank places that were never cultivated. And these places were fertile soil for noxious weeds of misunderstanding, particularly if the seeds were carefully planted by a shrewd and ruthless woman.

Steve and Linda had spent a long quiet evening together alone, both of them gathering strength from each other's company. Steve seemed less restive in their small hotel room than at any time since his return from the hospital in England. They had spoken of Axminister with optimism and Linda was beginning to feel fresh confidence in the prospect of starting a new life—a life in which Steve would slowly recover from the shock and injury of his recent experiences.

Steve lay back in the overstuffed chair and quietly smoked a cigarette. Linda found pleasure in just watching him.

"How about it, Darling?" Steve asked. "Getting tired?"

"Mmmmm." Linda was happy.

"Too bad you have to work again tomorrow," Steve said.

"I have to, Dear. There are still things I should do. I'd like to have things in good shape when I leave the company."

"Well, I guess I can take it," Steve squashed out his cigarette. He rose to his feet and stretched himself. "One of these days, though, you'll come home and find a note on that fancy pin-cushion saying, 'I can endure no more . . . don't try to find me,' if we have to call this hotel room 'home' much longer."

"It won't be long now, Steve."

The quiet of the room was shattered abruptly by the burring of the telephone. Steve and Linda exchanged glances. The phone was at Linda's elbow and she reached for it.

"Hello . . . yes . . . Grace?" Linda's voice was surprised. "Why yes," she said into the phone. "Oh . . . oh, we couldn't possibly, we're leaving very soon for Axminister. Well, it's very kind of you, but I'm sure it's not sensible for us. Yes . . . yes . . . of course. Well, just let me talk to Steve." Linda put her hand over the mouthpiece and looked at Steve. "It's Grace Marshall," she said in a low tone. "She's inviting us to stay with them till we leave."

"Nuts to that," Steve said. "Tell her no thank you, it's not worth the trouble."

But Linda was not capable of being that abrupt with other people. She tried to stall Grace, but got nowhere. Grace wanted to talk to Steve and Linda relinquished the telephone. Steve was equally helpless before Grace's arguments.

He hung the phone back on its cradle and turned to Linda, shrugging his shoulders.

"Oh, Steve," she said, "you've agreed."

"I couldn't help it. Anyhow, I said it would depend on you—"

"You know it's all settled, Steve. I couldn't possibly change it now. I can't think what—well, we're in for it now."

Steve threw his arms around Linda and held her close. "Well, Dear, it's only for a few days. We can stand it, can't we?"

"I guess so," Linda said unhappily.

Steve cupped Linda's chin in his hand and turned her face up and looked into her eyes.

"Linda," he said, "you look so stricken. I was a fool! I'll call her and say I'm against it. I'll say I've changed my mind."

"No, you mustn't do that. She'd think I had got you to." Linda's voice was panicky. "I can't have her thinking that, Steve. We'd better go. It will only be a little while—and sometimes we'll be alone. But, oh, Steve, darling, I'm frightened . . ."

The words slipped out without Linda's wanting to speak them. When Steve took her into his arms and asked what it was that frightened her, Linda could not say. But even Steve could not quiet the sudden small panic in Linda's heart.

Chapter IX

IT WAS mid-morning of the first day the Harpers were guests of Grace and Clyde Marshall, and Steve had gone back up to the guest room after breakfasting with Linda and seeing her off to work at the publishing company.

Although the Marshall home was large and generous, Steve had been trying all morning to shake off the feeling of being trapped. The guest room was a triumph, the beds were luxurious, breakfast had been sumptuous and elegantly served, but Steve was longing for the impersonal shabbiness of the hotel room he had shared with Linda and where nobody was wondering what he was doing and where the elevator periodically made a cheerful, indifferent racket.

Steve decided to sneak out for a walk, but met Grace coming back in. She explained that she had forgotten some papers and had returned to the house for them. She invited Steve to walk back a piece with her. As he had his hat and coat on, he hardly could refuse. For a few moments they walked along in awkward silence which finally was broken by Grace.

"The days must be rather dull and empty for you," she said.

"Well—there haven't been so many of them yet." He laughed wryly. "I don't plan on keeping this up. It's just temporary—"

"Of course. Are you eager to get back to Axminister?"

"I'll be glad to."

"But you've never liked the town, Steve, have you?"

Steve kicked a lump of snow with his foot. It was a beautiful early winter day, filled with whiteness and glittering sunshine. The air was just brisk enough to be exhilarating. Steve took little notice of it. He considered Grace's question.

"I didn't care much for the town—before I knew Linda. Since then, I guess I've understood it better."

"Linda is happy there?" Grace asked. "Does she have interesting work to do?"

"She seems to find it," Steve replied. He couldn't figure out what Grace was driving at.

"She's very gallant," Grace said. "You'd never dream, from talking to her, that she was making any sacrifice, ever."

"She's not the martyr kind," Steve said, grinning.

Grace was silent for a few moments. "New York offers a great many rewards for Linda," she said finally. "Not that she would ever mention it—particularly to you. What I mean is that where she thinks you need something, she would never mention her own needs."

Steve suddenly stopped walking. He looked at Grace with serious eyes. "No," he said, "she wouldn't. Say—have you got an idea about some sacrifice she's making now?"

Grace smiled tightly. "Well," she said smoothly, "you know Linda had done remarkably well in her editorial work for the Marshall Publishing Company. She's probably told you that Clyde can hardly bear to lose her. He's come to rely more and more on her judgment."

"Well, yes," Steve agreed, "but I didn't think it was so terribly important."

Grace pursed her pretty lips. "We haven't wanted to put obstacles in Linda's way, but there's no doubt that she would have a splendid future with us. I think Clyde would want to have her made an officer of the firm before long. I don't think you realize how valuable she has been."

"I thought she was some sort of a secretary," Steve confessed ruefully. "I guess I didn't quite realize what the situation was—I didn't know her work was that important."

"Linda never would ask anything for herself, I'm sure," Grace suggested.

"Oh, say, now—why it was she who suggested Axminister—"

"Because she thinks you need Axminister. She thinks you—your nervous condition—need a small, quiet town."

"Did she say that?" Steve demanded in alarm. "Did she ever mention—my—my—anything about my health?"

Grace laughed good-naturedly. "Not Linda. You know her better than that, Steve. I've come to know her very well in these past months. She's probably talking of Axminister for your sake, Steve, because she loves you too well. And what she thinks you need is—Axminister."

"Why, that's crazy," Steve cried.

They had resumed walking, but Steve's mind was at sea. Grace stopped at the corner to bid him good-by.

"This is all very interesting, Steve," she said. "I wondered whether you knew what a sacrifice Linda was making."

"Look, Grace, I'm glad you spoke to me about this. I think we won't be going to Axminister."

"You may have a hard time convincing Linda," Grace cautioned. "She'll never admit what's involved for her."

"I understand. Thanks for telling me—and I'll convince her."

They parted, Grace returning to work, Steve to walk aimlessly through the park, his mind in a new turmoil.

To Steve Harper, who had been suffering from a withering sense of uselessness because he was out of the war, the idea that Linda was forfeiting a career to take care of him was unendurable.

That evening when he and Linda were alone in the guest room at the Marshall home, Steve felt defeated and alone. The day had been long, a day of brooding and uncertainty. Since Linda had come home, he had been avoiding her questioning look. Finally she asked him if something was wrong.

"I've been thinking about Axminister," he said.

"You want to get out of New York, don't you?" Linda's voice was sympathetic and unsuspecting.

"Is that why you suggested Axminister?" Steve asked.

"Only partly."

"You think my health needs it?"

"Oh, Darling—"

Steve disregarded the hurt tone of Linda's voice. "I feel a little ridiculous in this role of an invalid," he said.

"Steve, oh, Steve—what's happened to you today?"

Steve crushed out the cigarette he had been smoking. "I suppose I hate to face the fact that your plan about going to Axminister and starting life there was entirely for my sake."

"But that's not true, Steve."

STEVE walked to a window and looked out into the darkness. "Those are just words, Linda." He paused. "I'm sorry, Darling. I don't want to be mean. I love you very much. It's for that reason that I can't bear to have you take me by the hand and—" His voice became sarcastic—"and lead me into the quiet peace and sunshine of Axminister."

Linda felt tears coming to her eyes. "All I want is to take you by the hand," she said. "You can do the leading, Steve."

He turned and looked at her with angry eyes. "There you go again—forsaking everything for me."

Linda came to him, put her arms around his neck. "Steve, why are we quarreling? We love each other. We can't make decisions without each other."

"I know," Steve said repentantly. "You see, it's this way: I've got a feeling that you have quite a future in New York—they want you to stay here—got a career all cut out for you. It's something you'd like to do. And all the time you've been talking about going home, you kept me from knowing that it would be a great sacrifice for you."

Steve bent down and kissed her. "Look, Linda, nothing matters to me. I don't care where we live. I'll get some kind of good, hard work in New York that will keep me busy—some work for which I don't need to use my hands."

"Oh, Steve," Linda said and her voice broke, "this is all so wrong. I've always been absolutely truthful with you. If you want to stay in New York, I want to, too, but if you want to go to Axminister, I would love it. Don't you believe me, Steve?"

"Let's not decide finally now, either way," Steve suggested. "Let's stay on in New York until we're both sure. It's a fork in the road, Linda, and we don't want to make a mistake—for either of us."

"All right, dear," Linda said slowly. "I'll write Dad and Mother."

See Ellery

Although detective Ellery Queen never before has permitted a studio audience at his broadcasts, he is making an exception these days. Small groups of Merchant Marine sailors are being invited to see the Ellery Queen broadcasts from the glass-enclosed second-floor observation gallery. Ellery feels that an audience in the studio might destroy some of the dramatic effect of the thriller mysteries for listeners.

Sentimental Gesture

When Phil Spitalny selected Town Hall in New York for his recent concert with his "Hour of Charm" orchestra it was a sentimental gesture. It was there years ago that Spitalny attended a concert by a woman violinist and first envisioned the all-girl orchestra which has been so successful on NBC Sunday nights.

Sounds Like Fun

Mel Blanc (Uncle Petie on NBC's "Tommy Riggs Show") does his about-town traveling via scooter bike in deference to gas-rationing.
Mel and his bright red put-put are a familiar sight on Hollywood Boulevard.

Ambidextrous Al

The versatility of the Burns and Allen soundman, Al Span, amazed the cast at a recent rehearsal when he subbed for the guest star, Akim Tamiroff. Al gave a perfect imitation of the Russian actor throughout the session. Then, to top it off, Al stooled as a Negro comic on the actual broadcast.

She'll Be Back

Because she made such a hit with listeners, Mrs. Willoughby is likely to be a frequent visitor to the newspaper office operated by Bob Burns as the "Arkansas Traveler." Poetess and busybody, Mrs. Willoughby is played by Irene Noblette, formerly of the comedy team of Tim and Irene.

730 SHAVES FROM 1 BLADE
AMAZING NEW
BLADE SHARPENER
New sharpener for all makes of double-edge razor blades performs miracles! "Not necessary to change blades," writes one user. Another says,
"Have used it bladeover 700 times. RAZOROLL really sharpens blades because it strops on leather. Gives keen, smooth shaving edges. No guess-work. Blade held at correct angle and proper pressure - automatically. Just turn crank to sharpen blade. No gears. Well made. Handsome, compact, sturdy.
Weighs few ounces. Will last years. Makes ideal gift.

Versatile is the word for Ruth McDevitt, plays the role of the lovable Granny Hewitt on the CBS dramatic series "Joyce Jordan, M. D." After leaving her daytime chores, she departs for the Fulton Theater, and becomes nightly a murderous old lady in "Arsenic and Old Lace." She's currently playing one of the leads in the Broadway comedy. She plays another gentle old lady—but one whose hobby is wholesale murder.

Cowboy Yarns for Relaxation

Billy Rose may have a hankering for air-planes when he is playing Chuck Ramsey in "Captain Midnight," but when he settles down to relax at night, there is nothing he likes better than to lose himself in a good detective or cowboy story.

Stanley Lurid in Oils

Paul Rhymer, "Vic and Sade" author, is the proud recipient of a glaring oil portrait of Third Lieutenant Stanley, hero of volumes of stirring fiction often quoted in the script. The painting, of a wall-eyed young officer (1880 type) with fierce mustachios, was presented by the lieutenant's real-life prototype, producer J. Clinton Stanley.

We pay big cash prices for thousands of different and women in every state in the Union! We have paid as much as $500.00 for a single book. We paid

 Mr. Kuchler of Wisconsin over $1,000.00 cash!
 For example, we will pay you cash for the following books as described in our price list:

Pilgrim's Progress	$4,000.00
Adventures of Tom Sawyer	200.00
Old Swimm'n' Hole	75.00
Black Beauty	100.00
Treasure Island	50.00
Scarlet Letter	35.00
Venus and Adonis	5,000.00
Snow-Bound	45.00
Uncle Tom's Cabin	50.00
Leaves of Grass	250.00
Ben Hur	25.00
Last of the Mohicans	50.00
Moby Dick	100.00
Little Women	25.00

Tamerlane & Other Poems	5,000.00

These are but a few of the many thousands of books we want. DON'T SEND BOOKS until you have checked our latest list giving full information. Don't delay—a single old school book, story book, Bible, poetry, history, travel, almanacs, newspapers, letters, autograph, etc., may bring you $25, $50, $100, $500 or even $5,000 cash for certain books. Better investigate NOW. Send

Church Named for Cadman

The memory of Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, "First Minister of the Air," was honored in Brooklyn, "City of Churches," by having two merged Congregational churches named the Cadman Memorial Church on January 1. Dr. Cadman was for thirty-five years pastor of the Central Congregational Church in Brooklyn, and through the medium of radio exercised a brilliant nation-wide ministryship. He appeared regularly on the NBC network from 1923 until 1936, the year of his death.

FEMININE FORUM

Give Your Skin a Chance!

HOW do you rate on face value? How do you rate on complexion beauty? Your beauty score should be ace-high—your skin should be summer smooth. So if you've treated your skin like a stepchild—neglected those flaky patches or powdered over the oily spots—it's time to get down to facts!

You must first understand your skin! There are four basic skin-types—so which is yours? Is it dry, oily, a confusing combination of both or one of the few rose-petal skins? If yours is the perfect kind, you need only the simplest soap-and-water treatment with a dab of night-cream now and then as wrinkle insurance. But the chances are three to one that your skin needs a special beauty formula to keep it in condition. So don't go on guessing! Be sure of your skin-type—and then pamper it like an only child! You'll find that a little extra care makes a lot of difference. It's worth a try!

Suppose you're a member of the dry-skinned clan. Winter is your bug-bear—you chap at the drop of a thermometer—your delicate skin needs to be coddled like a baby's! So, before a soap-and-water session, smooth on a creamy layer of Pond's Cold Cream to float away the dirt and keep the soap from robbing your skin of natural oils. Remember, don't rub your face—no washerwoman scrubbing for you! Make a bubbly foam of lather in your palms and fluff it onto your face. Then whisk away all suds with splashings of water. First warm, then cool, is the routine to follow. A film of Dorothy Gray's Special Dry Skin Mixture on top of that—and the rough spots will haunt you no more!

Now for you gals whose skin tends to be overoily! You must rule your complexion with an iron hand—for, if you aren't careful, the excess oil can lead to serious trouble! First and foremost, keep that face of yours forever clean! Soap and water are your best friends—use plenty of both. Concentrate on the danger spots—chin, nose and forehead. Those are the places where blackheads gather. Follow with Pond's Dreamflower Freshener to help your pores in their defense against grime! But, above all, never try to slip by with one make-up for the entire day. Change it at least once! And remove every last trace of old make-up before you put on your new face. It won't take long, but what a boost to your beauty!

Now, you confused charmers with double trouble! Some of your complexion is as dry as dust—and yet you're bothered with a gleaming nose and annoying blackheads! What can you do? Simply this. Foil the dry demon with a softening routine—coddle him with creams. And for the oily regions—soap and water! Use this half-and-half formula—your reward will be a skin that's smooth and clear, all over!

So give your skin a chance! Baby it, pamper it, and watch your complexion grow clear, soft and glowing! Then, when you check on your beauty rating, it will hit an all-time high!

—Dorothy Gray Photo

WINTER-TIME especially is time Milady has to look to her own particular type of routine for retaining the beauty of her skin. But whether your skin is oily, dry, or a combination of both, there's an answer to the problem

The Story Behind the Songs We Love
 BY THE KING'S JESTERS

RADIO-FAMED trio, The King's Jesters, study orchestration of the song written for our Navy's hardy trouble-shooters, the Seabees. The Jesters (l. to r.: John Ravencroft, Fritz Bastow, George Howard) are on Ben Bernie's show

No. 2 - "Beautiful Ohio"

The King's Jesters, John Ravencroft, Fritz Bastow and George Howard, heard daily on the Wrigley show and other CBS programs, have been delving into the success stories of hit tunes for many years. At John's home they have a huge ledger filled with notes about songs old and new, how they came to be written, and what happened to them. They've been collecting these notes for their own edification, as a hobby, but now they have decided to release some of the stories for publication. Here is the second.

SOMETIME during the first World War a young man whose name was Robert Kaiser wrote a song which he called Ocean Breezes. The music-publishing firm of Shapiro and Bernstein decided it was good enough to publish, but they insisted that the composer's name be changed to Robert King, since Kaiser was not very popular at that time.

The song was duly set up in type and an artist was commissioned to paint a picture for the title page. But when the artist showed his painting to Tommy Hughes, commercial manager of the music-publishing firm, Hughes shook his head.

"No," he said, "that won't do. That water doesn't look like an ocean at all, it's too yellow."

Then, as he saw the crestfallen appearance of the artist, he added, "Oh, it's a beautiful picture, all right, but it doesn't look like the ocean. It looks more like the Ohio River, the beautiful Ohio."

He paused a minute, then said: "Say, that would be a good title for it, wouldn't it. Beautiful Ohio. You know, I was born and raised in Louisville, and I know how beautiful that yellow Ohio River can be. Especially when it's a thousand miles away and you're remembering how it used to look when you were a boy."

So a set of new lyrics were written for the song and it was renamed Beautiful Ohio. But now Hughes decided it would sell better if it had a woman's name on the title page as the composer. The name Mary Earl sounded euphonious, so he chose it, though there was no Mary Earl and the composer was listed in the publisher's files as Robert Kaiser. So sure was Hughes that the song would be a hit that he priced the sheet music at twenty-five cents, although all music previously had been sold for ten and fifteen cents. Everyone in the music business said this was a mistake, that people would not pay twenty-five cents for a copy of any song. But the melody of Beautiful Ohio was so appealing that the song became a hit immediately, and has remained a favorite through the years.

The King's Jesters are heard on the "Ben Bernie Show" over CBS Monday through Friday at 5:45 p.m. EWT, 4:45 CWT, 3:45 MWT, 2:45 PWT, under the sponsorship of the William Wrigley, Jr., Company in behalf of Wrigley's Spearmint Gum.

SINGLE-DISH DINNERS provide a practical solution to one of the big problems facing the busy housewife these days. Madeleine LeBeau, beautiful Warner Brothers star, knows this secret of meal-time magic LADY Housewife is a busy woman these days—busier than she's ever been before! For this is the time when women are being called out of their kitchens—today they're doing a double job! So maybe you're one of those gals who is working hard and long in a war industry—perhaps you're filling the shoes of your man in uniform—or it's just as likely that you've volunteered your services as a nurse's aid or canteen worker. Whatever your role, it's dollars to doughnuts that your time is filled to overflowing—and that you have a hard time meeting your meal-time schedules!

For no matter how busy you are, there's still your family to feed! And you know that they should get at least one hot meal every day! That piping-hot dinner is a must when winter winds blow cold—and you don't want to skip it, even once!

But how are you going to manage? You spend the day miles from your stove—you haven't time for lengthy preparations or complicated dishes. Well, it can be done—and you don't have to be a magician! Just learn the secret of one-dish dinners—and your problem will be solved!

You see, there are lots of recipes which contain both meat and vegetables combined in one tasty dish—and that's the solution! Try a steaming casserole of ham and vegetables, for instance; or, if you like, celery knobs with meat balls. And if your family goes all out for spaghetti, you can whip up a dish of Irish spaghetti that will suit them to a T! So you see, you don't need a magic wand at all! These quick tricks will fill the bill perfectly—and, what's more, the family will love them! What could be simpler! Here they are:

Vegetable and Ham Casserole

- 1 lb. ham (slice the size of your baking-dish)
- 3 or 4 carrots cut in wedge shapes to resemble baby carrots
- 1 cup peas
- 2 cups string beans, broken up
- 1 or 2 sliced onions
- 2 or 3 potatoes, cubed
- ½ head cabbage, cut in thin sections

In a good-size baking-dish arrange layers of the string beans, onions, potatoes, peas, carrots and cabbage. Pour in at one side about one cup water. Season with salt and pepper and tuck the slice of ham over the top.

Cover and bake for one hour in a hot oven, uncovering the last fifteen minutes.

Celery Knobs with Meat Balls

- 4 celery knobs
- 4 cups boiling water
- 1 teaspoon salt
- 1 lb. ground meat
- 2 tablespoons flour
- 1 egg
- 1 onion, grated
- ⅛ teaspoon allspice
- Few grains nutmeg
- Few grains pepper
- ½ cup cold water
- ¼ cup flour
- ¼ cup cream
- 1 tablespoon butter

Pare celery knobs and cut in eighths. Cook thirty minutes in boiling water to which one-half teaspoon salt has been added. When knobs are tender, remove from water. Meanwhile, combine meat, flour, onion, spices, pepper and remaining one-half teaspoon salt. Mix well. Add cold water gradually, stirring constantly until the mixture is like thick dough in consistency. Form into eight or ten one-inch balls and drop into boiling celery liquor to make a thin paste and add to liquor in kettle, stirring constantly until thickened. Return celery knobs and meat balls to kettle. Add one tablespoon butter and heat thoroughly. Approximate yield will be eight portions.

Irish Spaghetti

- ½ lb. Canadian bacon, diced
- 2 cloves garlic, finely crushed
- 1 cup finely chopped green peppers
- 1 cup finely cut celery
- 1 cup finely cut onions
- ¼ cup chopped pimiento
- Salt and pepper
- 2 tablespoons butter
- 1 can tomato paste
- 1 (No. 2) can tomatoes

Saute bacon and garlic together five minutes. Add vegetables, salt and pepper and simmer fifteen minutes. Add butter, tomato paste and tomatoes, simmer twenty minutes longer or until vegetables are very tender. Serve over spaghetti. Approximate yield—four cups sauce.

Now, with your menu problem solved, dress up those dinners—serve tasty tidbits to tickle the palate! Spicy relishes, all sorts of pickles and preserves bring enthusiastic applause. Or add hot applesauce as a nourishing side-dish. There are countless ways to give meals that "special look"—and they only take a jiffy! Best of all, with difficulties gone and meal-time magic up your sleeve, you can do double duty! You can serve in the dining-room and in the war effort, too, and you don't risk your reputation as the very best cook that your family knows!

Hugh was born in Ridgeland, Ind., on May 31, 1900, but was raised and educated in Kansas City. His parents both sang non-professionally, and encouraged him to study voice, piano and pipe-organ in New York, Chicago and Kansas City. He made his professional debut as an entertainer with Joe Sanders' quartet at the age of twenty-one. From that time, until 1928, his career consisted of vaudeville, the concert stage, news-butcher-ville, farming, laundry work and, of course, radio. Radio entered Hugh's life in 1922 when he made his first appearance over a Kansas station, but it was not until 1928 that he began the long climb toward becoming one of radio's foremost character actors and leading men. He has brown hair, gray-green eyes, weighs 155 and is five feet eleven in height.

Chapter X

GEORGE EMERSON was a great man for a hearty breakfast. In fact, in his rare philosophical moments, George was apt to deliver himself of a home-made proverb: "As breakfast goes, so goes the day."

Irene may have thought sometimes that there was a touch of smugness in this wisdom, but she was too fond of George and proud of his self-made success to care to prick the bubble of his ego. So she always had cooperated to make breakfast an occasion featured by cheer and bright dishes and the smell of bacon. This morning, however, the bacon was missing.

Holly, who had a will of her own, now was working on Saturdays in the Emerson Department Store. Her father had protested loudly and vainly against it—and still protested. Holly had made a new friend in Mary Halliday, one of the sales girls, and George didn't exactly approve of the friendship. He felt that Mary was too old for fifteen-year-old Holly. But Holly, as even George knew, generally had her own way. Now she tried to explain to her father why the bacon was missing from the table. While she delivered a lecture on civilian defense and on the various varieties of meats still available for civilians, a special delivery letter from Linda arrived.

It was a letter explaining that Linda and Steve had decided not to come home—for a time at least. Irene, in a dismayed voice, read the last paragraph aloud.

"It isn't because we don't love you that we are staying in New York, Linda!" Irene looked up. "That's all," she said slowly.

"That's all," George echoed Irene's words. If anything, he was more dismayed than Irene.

"Aw, Dad, don't feel bad about it," Holly comforted. "It isn't because Linda doesn't love us. She said so. I guess Steve and Linda are the kind of people that belong in New York. Probably Steve is going to write a lot of new symphonies and Clyde—"

"Clyde?" cried George in alarm.

"Well," Holly continued without taking note of the anguish in her father's voice, "you knew how awfully interested Clyde Marshall is in Linda. He's probably given her a big office with modern furniture and a private secretary—"

"Holly, darling, perhaps you had better—" Irene's voice was quiet.

Holly looked at her mother. "I think it's about time this family faced the facts of Steve and Linda. You and Dad always do more wishing than thinking about Linda and me." Holly paused as she realized what she had said. "Oh, Dad, I didn't mean it. Don't look like that—I'm sorry, Dad."

"Maybe you're right, Holly," George said softly. "There isn't much—much in Axminster—to interest Steve and Linda."

Holly was contrite. "There's us," she said, "and I think we're kind of swell. Oh, Dad, if you don't want me to work in the store tomorrow, I'll resign."

George looked at his daughter affectionately. "Oh—oh, that's all right. I wouldn't want you to do that. It's kind of nice having somebody close in business with you. You just took me by surprise the other day."

He got up from the breakfast table without another word. He went to the hallway where he found his hat. He turned to bid his family good-by.

"Good-by, Dad," Holly called. "You don't have to worry about Linda. She doesn't love Clyde Marshall. He just loves her."

Poor Holly, so endearing and so devastating, had said the wrong thing again!

Chapter XI

STEVE and Linda Harper, once they had decided to remain in New York, wanted a place of their own to call home. The Marshalls, particularly Grace, urged them to stay on at their place and, for the time being at least, there was little Steve and Linda could do but accept the Marshalls' hospitality. The misunderstanding between them had grown until it filled their whole lives. It was nurtured carefully by Grace, who now recognized that she was interested definitely in Steve. Linda and Steve quarreled more frequently now and became more and more enmeshed in the web of misunderstanding that Grace had created between them.

Linda returned from work one night to find Steve brooding about her working while he remained at home. He said he had been worth more to her in the old days when he had a good right hand. "You're not feeling down about that, are you, Steve?" Linda asked rather sharply.

"Well, really—" Steve was annoyed. "I guess you think I'm always looking for trouble."

"Steve, dearest—"

"Making mountains out of molehills—"

"No, darling," Linda said earnestly, "I don't think that. But I'll be very glad when you come to believe that the world is full of interesting possibilities for you—even though you aren't fighting in the front lines now. I can't help feeling that if you would try something—almost anything—it would be the beginning."

It was at that moment that Grace chose to enter the living-room where Steve and Linda were bickering. "I'm not interrupting, I hope?"

Steve looked up at her and made a wry face. "You can regard yourself as a benefactor," he said. "My wife was just giving me a lecture."

Grace was amused. "Not Linda?"

"Steve's making fun of me," Linda said sadly. "Far from it," Steve said grimly. "I'm trying to follow orders."

"Oh—" Linda drew a quick breath, bit her lip.

Grace laughed pleasantly. "I can see that you need a little comic relief," she said smoothly. "Steve, I've been hatching out an idea but I'm afraid it's still too young for a public airing. I'm going to let you, and you alone, examine it."

"Sounds very exciting," Steve said without great interest.

"It requires privacy," Grace went on. "How about coming into the library with me. Clyde will be here to keep Linda company in a minute."

Steve hesitated, then suddenly rose from his chair. "Why—a—why not? It sounds to me like one of Linda's 'interesting possibilities'."

It was one of those sudden impulses that one yields to in bitterness—an impulse that Steve regretted before he had turned into the broad hall leading toward the stairs. The pure, pale oval of Linda's face, the question in her deep gray-green eyes tortured him and confused him as Grace Marshall skillfully projected her plan. But Linda, downstairs, knew only that she had hurt Steve in some way and that he had turned to Grace Marshall for sympathy or—

It was not until later that night that Linda learned what Grace had proposed. She wanted Steve to write a book about his war experiences. He told her that Grace had said he was at a crossroads and was "drifting to the dogs" unless he would decide to do something with his life. Linda resented Grace's warning, but noticed that Steve seemed somewhat interested in her suggestion although not committing himself to the project.

Grace came to Linda the next day and, in her most winning way, asked Linda to help persuade Steve to write the book. She argued that it would be a good book that would help in the war effort and, above all, it would be psychiatrically good for Steve to tell his story. The last argument won. Linda agreed to talk to Steve.

She did so, but several hitches developed in the plan. Steve fell in readily with the idea, but the Marshalls insisted on his staying on at their home with Linda. Grace believed that Steve would have more conveniences, including the dictaphone which he would use in his work.

Steve was unhappy about the dictaphone. Linda volunteered to take notes while he talked, and said she would type out the manuscript later at the office. But their first attempt at the system became a failure.

Steve, in recalling his experiences in war-torn France and the little peasant people who had risked their lives to help him, became morose and bitter about his own impotence in the face of a world situation beyond his control. He wanted to fight. Linda tried her best to convince him that his book would have a meaning, but also would be his contribution to the war. Steve half heartedly agreed and they went ahead.

Linda was very pleased after she had typed out the first rough notes on the book. She realized it was far from the finished thing, but she turned it over to Grace for her opinion. It was not until a few days later that Grace and Linda had a chance to discuss it.

The two women sat quietly in the golden light of the lamps in the spacious Marshall living-room. Their voices were cool and their words were carefully chosen. Under their smooth manners lay the smoldering antagonism of two women interested in the same man. To Linda, Grace seemed to be purring a little too much. To Grace, who wanted Steve, Linda seemed smug in the way of wives. Linda asked Grace to tell her what she thought of the first efforts on the book.

"Do you want me to speak as a publisher, Linda, or as a friend?"

"Why," Linda said abashed, "I don't know—as both, I suppose."

"Of course, you know what I think of the general idea of the book—"

"Yes. It was your idea. What you saw was only notes of Steve's random talk the other night. But I thought it might be something to start on."

Grace was cool. "The sooner it's started, the better."

"I can see you didn't think much of this—as a beginning." Linda couldn't conceal the disappointment in her voice as she spoke.

Grace, frank as usual, agreed with Linda. She said there had been "too much Linda" and "not enough Steve" in what had been done so far. She said Linda, in transcribing the notes, had permitted too much of her own personality to creep into the work.

"I had intended only to—to help him physically, since he can't use his hand." Linda was dismayed. "I wanted merely to act as his secretary."

"I can't help thinking the dictaphone is more practical, my dear."

"But, Grace, Steve seems to find it hard to talk into the machine. He says he's tried it. He seemed to need someone to talk to about the book. At least at first. That's why—"

"Talking might help, my dear, but not talking to you," Grace said flatly. "You're his wife. He must always be a little inhibited by that fact. It can't be otherwise. All psychologists would agree about it, I'm sure. A man tells a story one way to the woman he loves. He may tell something quite different to other people, for whom he has no particular role to play."

"I wonder—"

"I imagined it would be very difficult for you to face that, Linda. You've been—such a good wife to Steve. It must be hard to feel that there is a department in a man's life where a wife is not altogether useful. Now, Linda, I wouldn't deny him help—all the help he could use. Only I'm convinced that you can't help him."

Linda was puzzled by Grace's tone. "What are you trying to say, Grace?"

Grace looked at Linda with narrowed eyes. "It's not just mechanical help Steve will need."

Suddenly Linda saw through Grace. She remembered Walter Owens' warning and realized past history was repeating itself. Grace had come between Walter and Ann and the resulting divorce had wrecked Walter's life. Grace now was attempting to come between her and Steve. Linda saw the whole plan and realized the false position Grace had placed her in. Again she recalled how Walter had wanted to go back to Ann when it was too late. Linda made up her mind at once that she would put a stop to the whole thing.

"I see one thing clearly," she told Grace. "You want to help Steve write his story."

"Of course I do," Grace confessed with a slight laugh. "I've never made the slightest pretense about that."

"Probably not," Linda agreed. "It's just that I was blinded by my assumption that I'd work with him and—"

"Because you're his wife." Grace was almost sarcastic. "I don't know why it is that women think that being a wife is such an all-inclusive business. Even wives have their proper spheres. Is it because you don't trust Steve that you wouldn't like him to work with me?"

"Don't trust Steve? Don't be ridiculous, Grace."

"Then what are you worrying about?"

Linda paused before answering. "I have encouraged Steve to work on this book for only one reason—because I thought it would help him find himself—be work for him right away. But perhaps we'd better understand each other. I want Steve to do anything that will be good for him. I want the book, if he writes it, to be good, too. But I wonder—I wonder, Grace, if you and I have quite appreciated each other."

"Oh, possibly not," Grace said, "but I've always thought you were a very sweet person, Linda."

"Sweet?" Linda was angry now. "I rather wondered if that might be it."

"You sound as though I might be mistaken."

"Yes, you're mistaken, Grace. If that's all you think. No woman who loves her husband is prepared to be sweet indefinitely no matter what happens. And I love Steve. I don't want you to be mistaken about that, Grace, not for a moment."

The fencing was over. The fight was in the open and both women knew they were battling for a man they both loved. Linda knew now what had been behind all of her quarrels with Steve. She knew she had to get him out of the Marshall home and away from Grace's underhanded influence. There was only one course open to her now—and she decided to take it.

She returned home to Axminster!

Linda's family greeted her with open arms—gone was the worry in George's eyes. He knew that everything would come out right now that his eldest daughter had come home. Linda, too, felt confident she had done the right thing. She knew in her heart that Steve would follow her. She knew now that Steve loved her and that they had remained in New York only because Grace had told him it would be a sacrifice for Linda to come home. By coming home herself, she had proved it was no sacrifice. Now he would come to her and would find himself again, and together they would rediscover love and peace.

Linda was right. With joy in her heart and a tender smile on her lips, she welcomed Steve with open arms scarcely five days after she had left him.

Their new life together had started because Linda had followed the true dictates of her heart.
