RECORD CRISIS
■ Young rock artists could face a tough time in Britain if the present vinyl shortage develops to crisis point.
■ Record companies will become increasingly reluctant to sign new talent, concentrating instead on the big artists.
■ And budget records might become a thing of the past.
■ MM investigates the biggest trauma to hit the record business — the plastic shortage — on page 5.

BOB Dylan and the Band are returning to live gigs — Dylan's first tour since 1966.

A mammoth 38-date concert tour of North America has been planned for the New Year, beginning in Chicago on January 3 and continuing until February 14 when the tour closes in Los Angeles. A total of 600,000 people are expected to attend the concerts.

The tour, which will gross about four million dollars, also includes two dates in Toronto (January 9, 10) and four at the Nassau Coliseum (January 28-30).

Dylan and the Band are currently rehearsing in California and both have written new songs which will be debuted on the tour.

It will be Dylan's first tour since his motorcycle accident. Planning for the event started two months ago, when Bill Graham of the Fillmore fame, was contacted by David Geffen, today president of Elektra-Asylum. Geffen informed Graham that Dylan was interested in touring and Graham has subsequently handled arrangements for the event.

Shelved

Plans for CBS to release a new Dylan album, however, have been shelved. The album, as exclusively revealed in last week's Melody Maker, was to have been a collection of tracks recorded in 1969 and 1970.

No explanation for CBS's move has yet been given, but speculation suggests the album, tentatively called "Dylan," has been withdrawn because it might hinder the company's attempts to re-sign the artist. Dylan, of course, is currently out of contract.

A live album, in fact, will be recorded during the tour and, according to reports reaching MM, it could well appear on Geffen's Asylum label. This would explain Geffen's involvement in the tour.

It is, however, significant that Dylan, instead of moving more definitely into films, has opted once again for music.

Who storm
THE WHO walked off stage during the first of their three nights at Newcastle Odeon on Monday following a showdown with their sound engineers and management.
Pete Townshend and Keith Moon both smashed up their equipment and Townshend grappled with one of the engineers in front of more than 2,000 fans.
They left the stage after 30 minutes of their act and returned 25 minutes later. A spokesman for the promoter said there was no question of the band's two remaining Newcastle concerts on Tuesday and Wednesday being called off.

Band of Gold

Lorraine Alterman in New York talks to ROBBIE ROBERTSON

EVEN though everyone involved is tremendously excited about the Band/Dylan tour (reported on page one), 1973 still has some time left and The Band have other projects in the works. I phoned Robbie Robertson at his house on the beach not far from Los Angeles to talk about the group's new album "Moondog Matinee".

Although Robbie and his wife still have a house in Montreal, they love living at the beach and with the whole Band there it's kind of a Woodstock West.

The new album, named after Alan Freed's radio show, is a collection of oldies including tunes like Clarence "Frogman" Henry's "Ain't Got No Home," Chuck Berry's "Promised Land" and Leiber-Stoller's "Saved" (originally done by LaVerne Baker).

Why did The Band decide to do these songs?
"A couple of things," Robbie answered. "We started to work on an album before we did this and it's kind of musical adventure for us."

"It's much more musical than anything we've done before, much more complicated, much more sophisticated, but in doing so, we realized you just can't whip it up in a couple of months like you can regular albums."

"We were really looking to achieve what we said we would achieve so we said the best thing to do is to write this over the period of a year."

"But, in the meantime we needed to do something just to stay in there. The way things are going, you could feel a very strong movement towards this music."

"With American Graffiti and Grease and radio stations playing a lot of those songs, it's just becoming valid music all over again."

"A great portion of this album is our old nightclub act that we played 12 years ago."

"We thought 'gee, wouldn't it be fun for us anyway to go in the studio and put down a lot of those tunes

● This is probably the greatest time of our lives ● that we did."

"It was very difficult to do it. It wasn't as simple as we thought but as we got into it, it got interesting and we decided that we would spend a little bit of time on it."

"Most of the time was deciding what tunes we could get away with now and what tunes we couldn't."

Not only do the songs The Band selected work, but they work superbly as arranged and played by this tight knit group of musicians.

The Band have given the songs new energy and a very full sound that is completely contemporary.

They're not trying to mimic the past, but use its tunes in a way that's valid musically today — plus keep a sense of humour.

The last cut on side one, "Third Man Theme," is an instrumental certain to make you smile. "I just always loved it because it made pictures in my head," Robbie explained.

"When I listen to it, I can imagine Marlene Dietrich. Of course, there's that film. I love the 'Third Man' and I just always really liked the tune."

"We didn't do it totally serious which you can probably tell by the version. It's about half-serious, half not. I love the way it closes that side.

"It's probably going to be a big hit in Europe because they love instrumentals. They'd rather not hear somebody sing."

The cover of "Moondog Matinee" is a painting that's a tribute to the late fifties era and filled with personal bits and pieces of the Band's early days.

It's a street corner scene with the members of the group lounging around on the street corner in front of "The Cabbagetown Cafe" which has a sign "Jook Joint" over it and there's a pool hall and pawn shop as well as a couple of old cars.

Robbie described what he had in mind to Edward Kasper, the cover artist, who then went out and took about 100 photographs and painted the realistic scene from those photos of the real ingredients.

The pink and black trailer parked around the corner with the big black hawk on it was the way the Hawks used to travel.

Robbie, by the way, said they changed their name from the Hawks because it came to mean the opposite of dove in the political sense and they didn't want a name that could be construed in any political fashion.

The other car in the pictures is a '56 T-Bird that Richard Manuel once owned and helps set the time of the scene.

There is graffiti on the walls. One saying "Sonny Boy W." refers, of course, to Sonny Boy Williamson who the band was going to work with right before he died.

The "Big Albert" does not refer to the Band's manager Albert Grossman. In fact, Robbie said that the artist must have stuck that in and he doesn't know why because he didn't request that.

On the subject of Grossman, there have been a lot of rumours that the Band has split with him, but Robbie denied that and says they are still close to Albert.

The pawn shop with its musical instruments lined up in the front window made me wonder if times ever got so hard that the band had to pawn theirs.

Robbie said they just had the pawn shop put there to give a flavor of that era, but it is true that one time to get to Arkansas to join the Hawks, he had to pawn a guitar that he had paid $290 for. He bought an old Fender Stratocaster just like it last week for $600. "Maybe three years ago the guitar would have been worth $100," he said. "All of a sudden they realized, 'hey, these things are valuable.'"

"That wood was aged and they used different materials than they do now and they were much closer to hand-made.

I don't think the songs are tender. I don't think rock'n'roll is tender and the music on the album is just about all rock'n'roll.

"Now hard music is a different thing. It's called rock and it takes in different things than rock'n'roll took in."

Although Robbie has a whole batch of new songs aside from the concept album the group is working on, he said about "Moondog Matinee": "It just seemed to me it was no time to make any big heavy statement. It's just the times are not that way now. Heavy statements at this point are not heavy and the thing that we were into was getting there."

Of that concept album, he said: "We are still writing it and still working on it which is really fun for us. It's a total challenge unlike anything that we've ever done or anyone's ever done."

"It's a work, not a bunch of tunes. The whole album is a piece of music with lyrics but it's not divided up in three minute segments of tunes. It's a great exercise for us and we have it about 90 per cent done."

Aside from working on that and rehearsing with Dylan, Robbie is also listening to the tapes of the Watkins Glen concert.

There's four hours of playing there, but Robbie wants to get it down to a single album.

They did do some new tunes at Watkins Glen, but Robbie points out that the main thing about that album is the music in combination with the event.

They might put the Watkins Glen live LP out at the same time as they go on the tour.

"So far the tapes sound really good," Robbie explained. "There's a lot of that spirit that I was hoping for that is visible."

Robbie had to run off to rehearsal, "the name of the game" as he put it, but he did emphasize how happy The Band is these days.

"Things couldn't be better for us," he said.

"This is probably the greatest time of our lives. We are all feeling so good and we're thrilled with this new album."

"We're thrilled about the other stuff we're doing and we're thrilled about the tour. It's great."

GRECH'S NEW GROUP

RIC GRECH, just back from Nashville where he has been recording with the Crickets, is now finalising the line-up of his new group, which ought to be on the road by February.

Already named for the group are Mitch Mitchell, Poli Palmer, American guitarist Jo Janner and, it was reported this week, Reg King on piano vocals.

Name of the band has yet to be announced.

Jagger, Bowie for Tommy?

MYSTERY surrounds reports last week that Mick Jagger, Elton John and Curtis Mayfield have been approached for roles in the film version of Tommy.

According to a spokesman for the Stones, the rumours are completely untrue. "I deny it emphatically," Anna Menzies of the Stones' label, told MM. "I haven't heard anything about it and I'm sure Mr. Jagger hasn't either."

But at the Robert Stigwood office — which is producing the film — David English, manager of the RSO label, commented: "All three artists have been suggested, but no final decision about casting has yet been made."

English also confirmed reports reaching MM that David Bowie and Barbra Streisand have been considered for the film.

Roger Daltrey, however, will be taking the lead role in the movie, together with Keith Moon, who will be playing Uncle Ernie.

Pete Townshend is presently writing additional music for the film, which enters production next April under the direction of Ken Russell.

The soundtrack album will be recorded in January.

And Lou Reizner, the producer responsible for the stage version of Tommy — to be presented at the Rainbow next month — has begun work on the soundtrack album of the stage version of Sgt Pepper.

Reizner has, to date, cut the initial backing tracks with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. The show will be staged in America next year before coming to Britain — again produced by the Stigwood Organisation.

None of the artists involved in the Pepper project, however, has yet been announced.

IN BRIEF

MANFRED MANN'S Earthband have signed an exclusive recording agreement with Bronze Records for all territories excluding the USA and Canada. Earthband's next album is "Solar Fire" out on November 16.

Nektar started recording a live album at Yeovil Technical College on Tuesday to be completed at London's Roundhouse on November 25. The New Seeker combination of Marty Kristian, Paul Layton and Peter Oliver — who joined the group in June — make their bow on Polydor this month with an album titled "Peter Pau" and Marty.

JOHN Lennon's "Love" marks the CBS single debut of Asha Puthli on November 16. First single from the Groundhogs in four years is "Sad Go Round," out tomorrow (Friday). Amou Duul have cancelled their proposed British tour until after Christmas owing to the illness of guitarist John Weinzierl. Deejays Noel Edmunds and Kenny Everett take part in a studio discussion on pop music on BBC-1 TV's Search investigation of pop on Wednesday (14).

JIMMY HELMS, Madeline Bell and Doris Troy star in a BBC-2 TV special, The Power And The Glory, on November 24. A six-week American tour is planned for Deke Leonard's Iceberg next March. Deke's current single, "A Hard Way To Live" is released in the States on November 16 and his album, "Iceberg" is out at the end of January.

OLIVIA Newton-John has been chosen by the BBC to represent the UK at the Eurovision Song Contest in Brighton on April 6 next year. Jack Jones opens a fortnight's season at the London Palladium on Monday (12). From November 26 to 29 he appears at the Fiesta Club, Sheffield, followed by Talk Of The Midlands, Derby (December 1), Broadway Club, Manchester (3 and 4), Gaumont, Ipswich (7), New Theatre, Oxford (9), ABC, Plymouth (16), Town Hall, Leeds (14) and Coventry Theatre, Coventry (16). Jones, who recently re-signed a new, long-term recording contract with RCA, is now completing a new album for New Year release. Meanwhile, RCA has released a seasonal album, "A Jack Jones Christmas" on the 95p International label.

CARMEN, the flamenco rock band from Los Angeles, who guested on the recent David Bowie Midnight special TV from London's Marquee, make their first British tour during November and December. Supporting will be the four-piece Irish rock band, Rotgut. Threat to rock's future

THE future of young rock musicians could be gravely affected by the world shortage of raw materials, it was claimed this week.

The shortage of both paper and vinyl — the plastic substance used for records — is now reaching a critical stage. In America one record company executive has claimed it to be the biggest crisis the industry has ever faced.

And in Britain, Andrew Lauder, A and R head of United Artists, this week expressed fears that companies will become increasingly reluctant to sign new artists. "I think many people will start pressing records by artists they know will sell," he told MM.

"This means companies will start to create priorities, they will start backing certainties rather than take chances with new bands." This has already started to happen in the United States, where pressing plants have begun to work shorter hours and many companies have cut back on their releases.

The situation, in fact, is so serious that one official organisation, the Recording Industry Association of America, has called for Congressional action in an attempt to get favourable treatment in the allocation of raw materials.

The situation is further aggravated in Britain by the lack of pressing capacity — the factories can't keep pace with demand. Denis Knowles of United Artists, for instance, told MM: "Production at the moment is running at about 75 per cent of demand. And it looks to me as if the situation will remain critical until 1976."

Vinyl, of course is a petroleum-based substance and the Arab cut-back in oil supplies is also causing some concern, although ICI, the major manufacturers of vinyl in Britain, do not anticipate any immediate reduction in production.

Another result of the crisis has been the postponing of many albums — and the stock situation in the shops. Deke Leonard's album, for instance, was out of stock during his recent British tour. And Richard Branson, owner of Virgin Records, commented: "It's messed the label around a bit. Sales of Mike Oldfield's 'Tubular Bells' seems to fluctuate, some weeks it's out of stock."

The crisis, however, has yet to hit the import market. "We haven't been noticeably affected, perhaps because we don't stock enough albums for it to show," said Branson who also owns the chain of Virgin shops.

■ Argent top the bill at a special Christmas concert at London's Chalk Farm Roundhouse on December 16

The whole situation, nevertheless, will probably hit hard at small record companies. Vinyl is already being stock-piled by major companies and in the event of a severe shortage, it will be the small labels, without major resources, which will suffer.

It could also mean, in the long-run, an end to budget albums. "If there's not enough vinyl for cheap records, then presumably some companies are going to concentrate just on their full-price albums," said Lauder.

DON'S DATES

DONOVAN'S solo concert tour begins this weekend in Scandinavia, opening for five dates in Britain on December 1.

Release of Donovan's new album, "Essence to Essence," on November 23 coincides with the tour and features many star names among backing musicians.

Produced by Andrew Loog Oldham the album includes Carole King (piano), Nicky Hopkins (piano), Steve Marriott (guitar), Peter Frampton (guitar), Denny Seiwell (drums), Henry McCullough (guitar), Danny Thompson (bass, violin) and Bobby Whitlock. There are eleven tracks, recorded at Morgan Studios, London, and mixed at Synchron, Connecticut.

Material from the album will be performed by the singer on the tour, dates of which are: Stockholm (November 10), Copenhagen (11), Bremen TV (12), Dublin (14, 15), Zurich (18), Freiburg (19), Frankfurt (20), Munich (22), Hamburg (24), Paris (26), Stuttgart (27), Heidelberg (28), Brussels (30), London, Rainbow (December 1), Manchester Opera House (2), Glasgow Apollo (4), Croydon, Fairfield Halls (7), Bristol Hippodrome (9).

BOTKIN DIES

PERRY BOTKIN Sr, guitarist and musical director, died at his home in Van Nuys, California on October 14. He was 66. Botkin was music supervisor and guest guitarist for Bing Crosby for 17 years, and was considered a top player in his time.

Botkin made sides with the Cotton Pickers (Original Memphis Five) and various Red Nichols combos in the late twenties and early thirties, and also recorded with Hoagy Carmichael. In all he recorded for the Decca company for about 20 years.

He retired as a musician several years ago but remained active in music publishing.

FACES' TOUR

THE Faces new British tour which begins later this month will concentrate on cinemas and other small venues — to improve the rapport between the band and audiences.

The tour also coincides with the release of the Faces' new single, "Pool Hall Richard," due to be issued at the end of the month. It is backed by the old Temptations' number, "Wish It Would Rain."

The tour starts at the Granada, East Ham on November 29, continuing at the State Cinema, Kilburn (30), Bristol Hippodrome (December 2), Odeon, Worcester (3), Odeon, Birmingham (7), Queen's Hall, Leeds (8), Liverpool Empire (9), Free Trade Hall, Manchester (11), Blackpool Opera House (12), Apollo, Glasgow (15, 16), Newcastle Odeon (17), Bournemouth Wintergardens (19), Sutton Granada (20), and the New Theatre, Oxford (23).

The Faces conclude the tour with a special Christmas Eve party at the Sundown, Edmonton. John Baldry will be the support act on each date.

The Faces' new album, meanwhile, a live record called "Overture And Beginners" is released early in the New Year, to be followed by Rod Stewart's solo album, as yet untitled.

£10,000 BOOST FOR WYATT

OVER £10,000 is expected to have been raised by the Pink Floyd/Soft Machine benefit concert held for Robert Wyatt at London's Rainbow Theatre on Sunday.

The exact sum will be known next week. Both houses for the two concerts were sold out well in advance. Money raised will go towards providing home aids for Wyatt, who was injured earlier this year and who is now confined to a wheelchair. It will also help him to prepare the way for his future work in music.

Softs' manager Sean Murphy said there had been a "unique atmosphere" at the Rainbow. "The general feeling was very pleasurable," he commented.

Steve O'Rourke, manager of the Floyd, commented: "No profit was made anywhere — even trucks were loaned free."

EMI meanwhile, are re-releasing the Pink Floyd's first two albums, "Piper At The Gates Of Dawn" and "Saucerful of Secrets" as a double album package. The two record set, to be titled "A Nice Pair," will be released at the end of this month.

MERRY SLADEMAS

SLADE are releasing a special Christmas single, simply called "Merry Christmas Everybody," on December 7. It was written by Noddy Holder and Jim Lea from a chorus line they conceived two years ago.

The single is backed with "Don't Blame Me." The band, meanwhile, have cancelled tentative plans to play in Britain before the New Year.

IN NEXT WEEK'S MM

Viva Santana!

One of the most intriguing and productive relationships of the year was the surprising yet unexpected teaming of Carlos Santana and John McLaughlin. But team they did, and by George...

with what results. Now MM's West Coast band of investigations, Chris Charlesworth, talks to Carlos Santana in a fascinating interview that reveals many interesting facts about the McLaughlin-Santana relationship.

Steeleye Span, Britain's premier folk-rock group, have ascended to the heights in 1973, and as 1974 draws ever nearer, there are many who are asking, how will they fare, one the snows melt away. Ian Anderson, John Tull, and the rest of the band are now producing their next album. MM's cub reporter, Jeff Ward, probes the Steeleye depths.

The heartwarming when talent finally gets its due and a man is recognized for his skill. Such a man is Jimmy Cliff, who has been in semi-obscure until the dawn of a new decade descended upon him, and in a star was born. Now Jimmy talks about the lean years, and his fight to the top.

Sarah Vaughan, with a voice like silk, is hailed as the queen of jazz singers. It's been a busy year for Sarah. She's been recording in London and charming audiences across the world at her in-concert appearances. She talks to MM about her life and musical inspirations—mostly horn players, as it transpires, and not her fellow songsters. Don't miss the Jones-Vaughan confrontation.

PLUS: Flogging and cold showers — is it the only cure for these teen-aged pop fans with their Hi-Fi and make-up. Persister Booper — the new threat to our cities. And an exclusive interview with Hank Cow, country and western, a answer to the avant-garde. Hank tells how he battled for years in obscurity, a flabby wretch of a man, who could never afford a pair of clean socks, let alone a guitar. It's a stomach turning story you can't afford to miss.

Since his days as Otis Redding's partner, PHIL WALDEN has found a goldmine in America's Deep South with his Capricorn Records. In London recently to finalise British tour details for his label's best-selling artists, the Allman Brothers Band, he talked to MICHAEL WATTS

OUT of the South, like a bolt of blue streak, he's come, and the farther he's gone the greater has been the number of his satellites.

Eighteen corporations he's involved in now. Total earnings 40 million dollars a year. New offices opening up in the big American cities: Los Angeles, Boston, Chicago. This year his biggest artistic property will "do in excess of" three million dollars and is capable of earning up to 200,000 dollars a day. Up, up, up and UP! he goes.

"Anything ah do, ah overdo," says Phil, almost apologetically. He points to a pack of cigarettes on a table.

"Ah could go through four packs of them, one after another, just like that." With a snap of middle finger against thumb, the crack rings out.

But no, Phil Walden is not big-time, despite all the financial accretions to the contrary.

No egomaniac tycoon of teen he. No rock 'n' roll retinue, no gaggle of groupies, no sharp suits, no cigars — "ah don't smoke now, actually" — and no clue, really, to the fact that he's the mainspring behind a new music empire swiftly fanning outwards from Macon in deepest Georgia.

A good ole boy, in fact, is Phil — soft-spoken and casual in jeans, a touch hesitant, almost self-effacing.

An honest guy, you instinctively feel, and in a way a new type of American rock manager, who doesn't lead with his mouth.

But don't ever dismiss him as folksy, I was told once in Macon. "When you're sitting down with him and doing a deal, you soon find he's as damn sharp as a razor."

Macon, that tough little town a short plane-ride from Atlanta — Macon, which gave birth to Little Richard in the Fifties and Otis Redding in the Sixties — is where it began.

The city is growing rapidly these days; about 200,000 people live there now, and because a lot of industry is moving in, the city anticipates 10,000 new jobs in the next 18 months.

Walden is quite the city father in Macon. He owns Capricorn Records, and for the first time in two decades, probably, the inhabitants are beginning to see both that a lot of big musical talents are coming out of that area and that a lot of big money is consequently coming in.

In the Seventies, more or less, Macon has given to the world the Allman Brothers, and Phil Walden, who was in at the birth, is now watching with a fatherly eye as they grow up.

Capricorn Records is the fastest-rising label in the States. Walden officially set it up in 1969 when he took over the management and recording contract of the Allmans.

With the increasing prominence of the band he's expanded further into the American music market until now, when the Allmans are the most "current" act in the States, he and David Geffen at Asylum are the hottest label-owners in the business.

Though the Brothers are his biggest artists, the potential of his roster is considerable: the Marshall Tucker Band, Wet Willie, Captain Beyond, Maxayn (his only black act), Livingston Taylor and Martin Mull are some of the artists.

But Walden is, in a sense, an old-fashioned man with a belief in good, solid values that run somewhat counter to the prevailing demand for tinsel and glitter: music with fairy lights.

Earlier this year he turned down the New York Dolls. It was quite simple. Everybody told him he could make a lot of money with them, but it was the music he was interested in, and to him the Dolls sounded "horrible."

He checked them out, and checked them right off, too. "I just couldn't relate to them. I left after three songs. It was the worst I ever heard. They sound like some group's first rehearsal. They copy everybody in the world."

"It's like they got together and said 'let's study everybody that's making it'."

He pauses. "And I don't even think they're really gonna happen that big."

Now Alice Cooper, he reverts in the same breath, he has a lot of respect for — for the way he and Shep Gordon, his manager, have handled it.

He wouldn't run home and put on an Alice Cooper record, but all the same he feels they've been very creative. The difference, after all, between Alice and the Allmans is that between entertainers and musicians, and there's nothing wrong with being an entertainer.

"It's just that I chose a different field."

Walden sits back in his hotel suite in London. He's here to finalise details on a European tour in January for the Allmans, working in concert with New York agent Johnny Podell.

The latter is also drawing up dates for Alice Cooper in Britain.

He's a good-looking guy in a tough, silent way, his face a bit weathered.

Faded denims sprawl the length of the sofa. Only the flowery shirt is fancy.

He's 33 now and he's been involved in music 14 years. The son of a Macon clothing manufacturer, the bug got to him when he was in high school.

He'd had an elder brother who'd gone to work in Indiana, and he returned on one of his visits with a bunch of 78s: race records, as they were called then — the Clovers, the Midnighters, Joe Turner, stuff like that.

It was the time of schlocky, pop crap like "Doggie In The Window," and he'd never heard that kind of music before.

He began listening to black radio, and in the course of being involved in a social organisation in school became more directly associated with music.

"They had these white, swing band kind of things, with stand-up bass, but I pretty soon noticed that the black groups never had any equipment; it was always a mess."

"I figured I'd get 'em some equipment and some transportation, rehearse 'em, and see if it would work. Luckily the first one had a singer called Otis Redding."

"The band was Johnny Jenkins and the Pinetoppers, and they were a good band, too, I tell ya."

"I guess he was about 17. He was a tall kid. They used to call him Rockhouse Redding. He sang like Little Richard... well he sang like everybody."

He was Otis' partner and business manager for eight years, right up until he died. He still maintains a close relationship with the Redding family.

Otis' wife and brother work at Paragon Agency, which he co-owns, and he's just recorded his 12-year-old son, Dexter, with "Our Love Is Bigger Than Baseball."

"You can hear a little bit of Otis in his phrasing. He knows everyone of Otis' tunes backwards and forwards, and he's very serious about this; it's not some gimmick thing."

But if Otis was his first big act and a personal friend, Little Richard Penniman was his first idol.

He recalls hearing "Tutti Frutti" on the black radio station, and it was, Jesus Christ, the greatest thing that had ever hit him.

And his father was all upset with him for being so obsessed with "heathen music."

"Still, three days later I was in downtown Macon and I saw Little Richard on the streets and said 'boy, this is the greatest thing in the world!'"

"He was outrageous. He had an umbrella with him. Matter of fact, as he crossed in front of me I said 'Tutti Frutti', and he shook his finger and said 'good boogie!'"

"He used to sing 'Lucy Is juicy' and 'tight is all right', some pretty off-colour lines. He'd sing at this place, Ann's Tiptop, which is in the song 'Miss Ann.'"

"He's come out with all sorts of elaborate stories since then that they adopted him and he lived in their home — I think if he ever told the truth he'd turn into a block of salt! He just exaggerates (a wide smile). I think he's brilliant."

It's Richard's own fault, thinks Walden, that his popularity has waned: all that extravagance and self-assertiveness, the need to do things his own way.

"I don't really think he wants good sound advice. He's Georgia's rock and roll star."

Had he ever wanted to manage him? "Oh sure, just out of reverence. We're good friends."

These were the days, though, before the proportions of the Macon music scene were fully understood; when James Brown, who was based there, would ride along with his whole band in a little station wagon with a card in the window that said "James Brown And His Famous Flames." "Please, Please" was cut in the radio station where Johnny Jenkins recorded.

Macon — what's been so special about it? Lena Horne is from there, too. Perhaps because it stands for the South, and the South, he feels, stands for honesty.

A Southerner always tells you straight, he emphasises. Forget the propaganda: the land has been a scapegoat for a lot of things that are wrong with America.

"When integration came about the South objected to it, but once it came they were more integrated down there than anywhere else, particularly in the schools."

There's a tendency, especially by the press, to quote a Lester Maddox or some racist bastard rather than a Jimmy Carter (Georgia's governor).

"But the South is one of the last frontiers of America. Southern people are nice. The Southern lifestyle is nice."

"I think the environment is more conducive to creative things; everybody's not in such a big rush. It's the only part of the country that's got an original culture."

"The food is probably the only original American food. I'm very proud of my Southern heritage."

From Otis onwards, who was managed by his original company, Phil Walden Artist and Promotions, he and his brother Alan manoeuvred themselves into the position where they had almost every R and B singer that came out of the South.

At one point, he says, they had the largest R and B stable in the world: Eddie Floyd, Sam and Dave, Joe Simon, Percy Sledge, Johnny Taylor, Arthur Conley, Clarence Carter and King Floyd, apart from Otis.

"Basically we used to manage about 90 per cent of the acts on Stax." A lot of them still book through Paragon.

His brother has since quit to form his own company. He manages Lynyrd Skynyrd who are with Al Kooper's Sounds of the South. "He doesn't share my enthusiasm for work that much," Walden adds wryly.

But when he first had the Allmans he was still basically into R and B. They were a composite of two bands, and the Allman Brothers as they emerged was a second group.

They had begun recording in Muscle Shoals, he explains, with Duane, Johnny Sandlin on drums (now a Capricorn producer), Berry Oakley on bass, Paul Hornsby (who now produces Marshall Tucker) on organ, and with Duane singing. They had cut three-quarters of an album and Duane wasn't happy with it.

"Then Jaimoe (Jai Johnny Johanson) came over to Muscle Shoals and he and Duane took off, first to St. Louis and then down to Florida, where Duane looked Berry back up."

"Berry knew Butch and Dicky and they got those together and eventually called Gregg. He was still out on the West Coast, trying to pursue a solo career, and actually started work on an album in Liberty out there."

"He was really what the band needed, because at that particular time they didn't have anybody that was writing tunes and they needed a singer.

"Dicky didn't have any confidence in his singing ability, then, and even his writing... he's a very quiet person, y' know."

"I'd heard of Duane in New York through Rick Hall (boss of Muscle Shoals). He played me the new Wilson Pickett session (one of the few Southern black acts of the Sixties he hasn't managed) and it was 'Hey Jude.'"

"I said 'who the hell's your guitar player — that's not your regular man!' and — if you know Rick, he's a very funny guy — he said, 'man, that's some long-haired cat, funny weird-looking cat with hair way down here.' (Course, you can imagine the effect in Muscle Shoals then — this was in 1969.)

"I said he's incredible, we should put a group around him. So we started doing it together, but he was bought up and nothing really happened with those tapes."

"The blues tune on the 'Anthology' album, 'Goin' Down Slow,' with Duane singing, was from that session."

"If we ever do a sequel to that album we'll probably put them out, but I don't think we will. I don't want to drain the barrel."

One track that was on that "Anthology," however, is of interest because of the link it provides between Duane and Walden's first ever artist, Johnny Jenkins.

This was a version of Dylan's "Down Along The Cove," which initially was recorded with Duane singing but was then wiped because he wasn't impressed with his vocal.

Jenkins, who played harp and sang on it finally, made an album for Capricorn called "Ton Ton Macoute."

An incredible talent, says Walden: "He could play the guitar left-handed, upside down and backwards. Hendrix even mentioned him."

A lot of Hendrix's movements, playing with his teeth, Johnny Jenkins was doing in 1958. But he just doesn't want to be a star.

"We decided to put together a trio with him, sort of à la Hendrix. Jaimoe who'd played drums with Otis one time, was very good friends with Twiggs Miller Lyndon, who was road manager with various groups I had for ten years.

"We'll probably reissue that album at some point. Strangely enough, it's being reported now on various FM stations as an import. They've got British copies of the record."

He has this philosophy about music and business: if you hear something that's really good and stick long enough with it, it will eventually emerge.

Going back to the early days of the Allmans, everybody had said they'd never make it, that they were playing above people's heads.

After all, nobody in the group danced or did somersaults; they just stood there and played. Heinous crime!

A lot of people thought they were only playing for themselves. Now, of course, as he points out, they can earn up to 200,000 dollars a gig, which is probably what the amount was for Watkins Glen.

It has been immensely hard work, he says. Four years ago, they'd play 27 out of 30 days, and any time they were given the opportunity they'd do a four or five hour set (long performances are still their milieu).

And it had never been plain sailing. First Duane, then Berry... Otis, too.

Wasn't it almost sinister how he'd become associated with so much tragedy through his artists?

"Yeah, I tell you," he says, breathing deeply, "creative people aren't normal people, and in turn maybe they take more chances — they live faster. "I don't know," he clears his throat, "I was very close with Duane. He, like Otis, was an incredible person."

I pointed out that it was virtually impossible to get the rest of the band to talk about Duane or his death.

There was a short laugh. "They don't talk! They just talk amongst themselves, mainly."

Duane used to do interviews a lot. He was a high-speed type of guy. Reckless. Different to Gregg. Gregg's more laid back.

"There's not too many similarities between them. Duane never did much writing, either, whereas Gregg has always done a lot."

But it was a closed subject, I persisted. "Well," he says slowly, "I think, not meaning disrespect to anybody, that it's really a personal matter and not something which should constantly be brought up and re-discussed."

"It was a horrible thing but it happened. I think it shows the greatness of that particular group and the strength of the individual members for them to continue and climb to the heights."

"It not only takes people who're very talented, but who are very strong emotionally and physically. Duane was more than a musician — he was an inspiration for that band and that inspiration still exists."

"Without the closeness they have amongst themselves I don't think they'd ever have happened."

It had been Berry Oakley who was most affected by Duane's motorcycle accident: "He was the big one about 'the famous spirit.'" Walden continues sombrely.

"That was a very important thing to Berry. He idolised Duane; I don't know that he ever recovered from his death."

"He didn't cope with it as well as the others. Emotionally he was very drained. Y'now, he had an automobile wreck and knocked up a telephone pole the night Duane died. He just couldn't handle it."

Duane was just his inspiration, literally his brother, and he credited him with being the guy who brought all those musicians together.

"He always thought it was the greatest band that ever was. And he respected Duane's approach to the whole thing. I recall one quote of Duane's: 'if you want to see a lotta fancy-dressed guys don't come and see the Allman Brothers 'cos it ain't no fashion show. Music is our signature.'"

After the accident, Berry became withdrawn. "He talked about Duane constantly — it was Duane this, Duane that, our brother Duane — and Berry tried to be, er, like Duane."

Walden picked at the words — "reckless, just living life for every minute."

His own reaction had been one of shock, of course, but grief was a very private emotion. Somebody always has to show strength, he says, and he tried to appear strong and hope that in turn it would make others feel the same.

"But when I was alone..." Perhaps, though, I suggested, in a horrible way, like the granting of the Monkey's Paw, it had helped the band to get where they are now in that America responded emotionally.

He purses his lips. "Yes, I've heard that, but I think of it as people respecting them for going on the road again so quickly. I think the people were amazed at the group's ability to not only cope but continue to create. That's the real strength of the Allman Brothers."

The subject was dropped, ever so perceptibly. Walden was talking about the Capricorn studio in Macon. They'd had a lot of enquiries about renting it out.

Johnny Rivers had wanted it and Columbia had requested it for the John Hammond / Mike Bloomfield/Dr John album.

Then there was Link Wray but they couldn't get him in, and Roy Buchanan was all set up and then had some problems at the last minute with Polydor. But it was, after all, for Capricorn artists. The Brotherhood syndrome.

Walden laughs. They have a big thing with kinfolk at Capricorn. Two brothers in the Allmans, two in Marshall Tucker, two brothers and a sister in Wet Willie, and then there was Liv Taylor and Alex, who they'd had until recently.

The famous spirit! Phil Walden is a big one for it, too.

RAVER'S HOT LICKS

Rolling Stones: back to Dynamic Jamaica

It seems the Rolling Stones will be doing their next album the same place as the last — down at Dynamic Sound Studios in Kingston, Jamaica.

Byron Lee, Dynamic's owner, says they'll be down there the latter part of November. He told our man in Montreal, Bill Mann, that Keith Richard's Land Rover and gear was there already, and Bianca Jagger was opening a boutique.

Lee says on the "Goat's Head Soup" session they couldn't decide which song to make the single: "So Ahmet Ertegun (boss of Atlantic) flew down from New York and listened for three nights. It was between 'Angie' and 'Dancin' With Mr D.'" and Ahmet urged them to choose "Angie." They tried about 30 times before they got it to sound right.

Although there's no reggae on the Stones' album, Lee doesn't discount the oppressive heat in Kingston as a mellowing factor in the finished product: "Everywhere else, musicians can work in the studios 12 hours a day, in Kingston eight or nine. But somehow they get more work done down there." And even though Cat Stevens' "Foreigner" doesn't have any reggae influence showing through from his spell at Dynamic, Lee claims to have spotted Latin influences on the album. "Hey," he adds, "did you listen carefully to 'Live And Let Die' by McCartney? The middle eight is reggae."

Byron and his 16-piece band, the Dragonaires, were playing a week's run at the Edgewater Hotel in Montreal.

The hits, he says, have helped reggae, but they've also hurt it. "Like Johnny Nash — he sings a sweet, country and western reggae."

"There's lots of kinds of reggae, but downtown reggae has never really hit the charts. The pop stars who come down here just borrow reggae and they usually cover it with strings and things. See, it's holes in the music that make reggae so great. The holes shouldn't be filled in."

There's never really been a solid reggae record that's made a big breakthrough in the US and England, although Jimmy Cliff's soundtrack comes close. Actually, I don't really care what I play as long as it makes people dance. It's just that reggae makes a lot more people dance."

FRANK ALLEN, bassist with the Searchers, has written a very nice letter to our own Steve Lake on pink paper decorated at the corners with pretty flowers.

It was regarding our Highbrow's reference to the Searchers in his feature on Roxy Music last week in which he noted that a couple of them went backstage "presumably to pick up some tips on crowd manipulation."

Lakey went on to say, "I'd tell you their names but they were before my time." Oooh, the saucy monkey!

Mr Allen asks: was the cynicism justified or kind? He says the Searchers' recent gig at Slough College of Technology would prove they were still where it's at: "The audience were very trendy, indeed," he tells us.

In fact, he says, he went to visit an old friend i.e. Bryan Ferry — a relationship which might astound Roxy's doxies. He says they first met about a year before Roxy Music emerged as a recording band.

He goes on: "We've been in touch occasionally, and in fact, he appeared backstage at the Tavern nightclub in South Shields nine months ago."

"Being around years ago is no criteria for ridicule. We're all older than the next generation, and I even feel that you shouldn't be so ready to write us off, musically."

LARRY ADLER wants to get New York pianist Ellis Larkins over here to play

WHAT'S this we hear? ZigZag, that rock organ formerly edited by illustrious rock encyclopaedia Peter Frame, has wrung vast confessions from British jazz pianist Stan Tracey. . . . American notes: The Grand Funk pop band has been seen hanging out with actor Peter Lawford ("The Thin Man") in Hawaii. . . . Isis, the eight-woman rock band from New York, looks set to bust big. The MM was the first music paper to write about them, way back in January this year. . . . And finally, we are able to announce with great cheer that Nico will make another album in January in England, possibly with Michael Oldfield producing. Magma, Giorgio Gomelski's band, may also do something with her, supervised by Giorgio. C'est la vie. We're off letters (and it's a fact that Eno received more fan mail while with Roxy than any of the other members).

"When Eno goes on to tell me that he's interested in conveying a more sinister visual style, I'm not at all surprised, since he's been hovering around the flat clad in black, like Rif Raf of Rocky Horror fame. He was like a creature from "Grey Lagoons" with his long, lank hair.

SO THAT'S What They Mean When They Call Him A Creative Genius Dept, Part Two:

Nell Young's Crazy Horse have become the Santa Monica Flyers, we hear from our American Airlines correspondent, Pam Ann.

The blonde, curvaceous stewardess, who's known to many a first-class passenger, says she was just strapping Nell in on the London flight when his body became rigid with thought. "He appeared to be going through a period of turbulence," she tells us.

A spokesman for Mr Young said later: "Nell had one of his brainstorms and decided to change the name. It was just a whim — there's nothing behind it." Still, Warner Bros have had to change all the posters for the singer's tour this week. Crazy, hock.

"In a cloud of feathers, sequins and satins he was a delight to see on stage — not that we ever got a good look at him with Bryan Ferry having sole possession of the spotlight! But then, Bryan and Eno always were at complete opposite ends of the Strand.

"Now that Bryan Ferry, he's just decaying into the past. Cool as a cucumber in his white, superfine, superslick suit, dark hair swept back, he looks somewhat like a Hammer Films Valentino as he sneers viperish into the mike, spitting out the words 'black is the colour and none is the number.'"

"Behind him, chanting in the back-up vocals, stand the Angelettes, looking more like the Gangsterettes complete with dark, winged sunglasses, fifties hairstyles and black mac, with turned-up collars. Well, there we are, the 'new' Ferry look is one relying entirely on the past. So there!" Thank you, Hettie. See you next week.

Cockney Rebel

"The group's name sounds more applicable to a greyhound, but don't let it deter you from buying or borrowing (permanently) this wonderful record. It's a classically influenced ballad with the upper lead vocals placed, delicately, in the middle of the finest string and bass arrangement I've heard since the Titanic sank. The lyrics are a little contrived... but just you wait for the grand choral work. (Play it again, Sam.)" N.M.E. 8/9/73.

"The Rebel are a very interesting band indeed, and this is an adventurous and unusual performance" Melody Maker 8/9/73.

"Concert-classical type of string sounds here, and a strained voice, and a beautiful mood as that aforementioned strained voice gets at it. Lyrics are excellent, production first-class... and well, just ask for it, and listen to it." Record Mirror 8/9/73.

This is how the music press reviewed Cockney Rebel's single "Sebastian". "Sebastian" is included on their first album "The Human Menagerie", released this week on the EMI label. Go and ask your record dealer to play it to you, or, better still, go and see them playing 'live' at—

Wyatt fights back

He'll never drum again, but Robert Wyatt is getting ready to return to the rock business. From his hospital bed, he talks to Steve Lake

LAST week Robert Wyatt and his lady Alfie had five pounds in the bank. Not a great reward for almost a decade in the music business, and the sort of situation bound to bring a little panic to any temporarily incapacitated musician.

And for Robert, of course, the prospect was particularly grim. Doubtless everyone knows by now that Robert broke his back in an accident at a party back in June, and now he's paralysed from the waist down.

The cold hard facts are that Robert will not be able to walk or play drums again. For a lesser person that could be the absolute end of the line, nothing left to do but wallow in self-pity.

Not Robert Wyatt, though. He's re-evaluating his position as a musician, and trying to find a way to return to playing as soon as possible.

I went down to Stoke Mandeville Hospital with Mike Ratledge and Soft Machine manager Sean Murphy last week to see Robert. Frankly, it was a confrontation that I just didn't feel I was emotionally equipped to deal with.

What words could I possibly say to a personal musical hero, now confined to a wheelchair, that wouldn't sound like an obituary?

Some kids grew up with Gene Krupa, some with Jagger. Me, I grew up with the Soft Machine, went to more gigs than I can remember, and it was always an education to watch Robert.

It's not generally acknowledged yet, but Robert was a true innovator as far as drumming's concerned in the mid-sixties, single-handedly responsible, I think, for a lot of the cross-fertilisation that has occurred between rock and jazz.

But my worries were unfounded.

As soon as I saw Robert now out of the wards and as comfortable as possible in a cosy hospital annex called Ashendon House, I realised that he's capable of becoming an influential musician all over again.

One only has to look at his track record to understand the possibilities that are open to him. Generally speaking, if you deprive a drummer of his ability to drum, he doesn't usually have much to offer musically. Wyatt has always been more than just a drummer, however.

For two years he was the lead singer with a Canterbury band called the Wilde Fowers, and later of course he vocalised with the Soft Machine and Matching Mole, so he'll be singing more in future.

Then there's his keyboard playing, about which he's always been unnecessarily humble, because he's very original.

As if that weren't enough, he's dabbled with electric guitar ("Memories" on Daevid Allen's "Banana Moon" album), and he once played trumpet in a trio which featured Daevid Allen on guitar and Terry Riley on boogie-woogie piano.

He has actually done some recording since his accident, proof that you can't keep a good man down.

"I went on my first outing since the accident, last week," he says, "to the Manor. I was hanging around the studios while Hatfield (And The North) were recording, hoping to be asked to rattle a tambourine or something, 'cos I'm pretty good at that, and eventually Phil (Miller) getting embarrassed by my presence, gave me a piece of paper and said 'Well, while you're here you might as well make yourself useful. Sing this.'"

"It was a new song that he'd just written. I thought 'Christ, I'll never be able to learn it. I'll make a fool of myself.' As it happened, though, it worked out all right."

The Pink Floyd/Soft Machine benefit concert came as a pleasant surprise.

"I couldn't believe it at first, in fact I didn't believe it till I read it."

"But I'm knocked out because it means I can stop worrying about money for a bit, and that's a tremendous load off my mind."

And future plans? Rumour has it that Robert has written a whole batch of hit singles from his hospital bed.

"That's not quite true. I'd written a lot of songs for what was going to be the third Matching Mole album with Bill (McCormick), Francis Monkman, and Gary Winde. I thought I'd got them all sort of safely stored in my head, but what with one thing and another I've forgotten most of them."

"I've been working on some tape loops and things though."

"By chance I've met a guy who's a friend of Ron Geesin's, and just happens to live across the road from here."

"He's got a piano, and some Revox machines, and Alfie's got me this little Japanese organ. We've made some funny old tapes. This guy doesn't know anything about me or Soft Machine or anything, but does know a lot about recording techniques."

And so, with more problems than most people could handle, he plans to slowly re-turn to the fast-living rock 'n' roll circuit. I'm a hundred per cent certain that he'll be strong enough to cope with the pressures

Withers: you gotta be insane to be a songwriter

SLAB FORK, West Virginia, is a coal mining town. Bill Withers was born there.

Between the ages five and 12 he came to know death pretty well. Like all mining towns, pit disasters were frequent. At least once a fortnight there'd be strained faces at the pithead waiting for news of the dead and the surviving.

It made him fatalistic, he reckons. That's why if his swift success, earned late in life for a musician and writer, were to end tomorrow, he'd be able to cope with it.

His brother, for instance, was injured in a mining accident and cracked a good few ribs, while during his years in the navy he'd see guys fall off the side of aircraft carriers (easy to do apparently).

Bill Withers is a wise man by experience, not (his own admission) by formal education. The only real contributors to early learning were his English teachers, who gave him a grasp of the use of dialectic language, and his parents who taught him the benefits of clarity and brevity — "if I'm gonna sing a simple song, I only got maybe 13 words in a whole song and the melody's not very much, then I'd better be clear so you can hear."

It's very clear from what Withers says of his songwriting and performing that here is an artist who is a troubadour in the ancient sense of the word — maybe he doesn't sing of courtly love and such but he does sing of love and life as he knows it and feels it.

A reflector of life may sound dour and grey. Withers is neither. His zest is as immense as his large, strong frame — his humour cool and sharp. Both qualities highlight his performance.

As much as anything, Withers' homespun tales captivate his audience. By his own admission he's not much of a guitar player, his voice is powerful and raw in the upper register — slightly suspect lower down the scale. An expressive tone which complements lyrics, uncluttered by over-elaborate melody.

by

Despite his accomplished performances, Withers still sees himself as primarily a writer and producer. "The advantage that I have, the thing that allows me to work, is that I have songs that are original, and whether I do it good or bad, it's gonna be the first time you hear it 'cos it's mine."

He reckons he's a very basic songwriter "in that the only information I have is instinctive information. I'm not well read. Most of the information I get from somebody that's around me who reads. My wife is very literate so I might listen to what she says — second hand information."

His state of mind when he's writing is, says Bill, critical. "I can't write anything when I'm that depressed" ("that" being the depths of despair "Ain't No Sunshine" plumbs).

"I can write about depression when I'm cool, but when I'm depressed I just wanna feel sorry for myself and try to find somebody who'll give me some sympathy. It's a very human thing to do."

"People like myself are not particularly easy people to have around because there's not much consistency in our attitudes. The personality might be consistent, but there are highs and lows."

"So songwriting, I think, is a very valuable thing to somebody like myself who is over-emotional. I'm over-emotional. No doubt about it. Totally over-emotional. I can become so angry that it's shameful . . . at the same time I can become so elated that it's ridiculous.

BILL WITHERS: 'Basic blues lyrics irritate me. They are a little too foul'

"And it gets you in trouble being over-emotional because you over-react and you talk sometimes and you say things . . . like to the Press for instance."

"Once in a while I say something that gets misunderstood. You get going and you really want to make somebody understand. It's being kind of like an evangelist. "There's certain elements in writers that sometimes make them detestable people. Very few writers when you really get to know them personally, are easy to tolerate."

"In the first place most writers are very self-righteous because they're always trying to tell somebody somethin' — 'I'm telling you because I got it together' — and you really get to know the guy and he doesn't have it that much together."

"I'm as insane as anybody else, probably twice as insane as anybody else, but at certain times you like to make believe you have personally solved all the difficulties — 'And now I will say to you' . . . 'I will remind myself of ALL the tender moments in my life with my grandmother', y'know?"

Withers ties together all the themes of his songs, "Lean On Me," "Use Me" and "Granma's Hands" in a long, back-and-forth conversation with himself and an imaginary second party.

Subjects of his songs are illustrations of actuality given life through the fantasy of composition.

"I think probably the most difficult thing for people who are honest writers is for them to relax and enjoy something."

Withers says he can never relax for a long period. Maybe an hour, maybe a day, but a really long spell, like a month, is rare.

"You've got to be very complicated to say simple things. The most effective songwriters say very simple things. You've got three minutes. What can you say?"

"It's a long way around a person's whole life and you got three minutes to say something profound. You gotta be nuts. You gotta be a little insane."

The actual development of his writing has been lyrical individuality, melodic reliance.

"Melodically I try to stay simple because a lot of times people ask too much. They make a melody that's too complicated for you to listen to."

Although Withers' singer-with-guitar act may seem to use blues as its main influence in the close rapport he builds with an audience, Bill says that his melodies probably owe more to the church.

Someone like Rosetta Tharpe or the Pilgrim Travelers owe nothing to, say, Duke Ellington but, Bill believes, the jazz composer owes a lot to Sister Rosetta's church and gospel music.

"They won't listen to Ellington because it's too sophisticated. There's not enough energy (slaps legs) there and they don't have time to be sophisticated and dress up. They want to perspire and scream and yell and feel good enough to physically move."

"There are a lot of refined descendants of this kind of stuff. It's like me, I want to perspire, I want to feel stuff that's gonna make me feel somethin', make me cry or make me laugh and not leave me casually sittin' there."

"The basic blues, to me, the lyrics, always seem to irritate me, because they were too structurally basic. They were a little too low-life . . . a little too foul."

"There's no tenderness, no love . . . too rough. I like the noise, but the lyrics were always just dumb."

It's always to gospel melodies that Withers returns.

Once he has drawn the lyrical and musical threads together and written the song and recorded the album he "feels like I've written my last word and I get afraid that nothing else is gonna come and the elation from the next song makes me just jump up and down and go crazy."

Bill just needed one song to start him off. Once that hurdle was cleared "I was cool. Then I was knockin' songs out in the bathroom, y'know, drivin' down the street with a piece of paper beside me."

Bill says he's never written anything yet that makes him feel he's composed the definitive Withers song — "I still feel like a beginning songwriter, a first grade songwriter."

But if the performances and records were to end, Withers, you feel, could cope with it. There are more important things in his life.

"I never expected to do this well in my life anyway, but if it stopped now, I would reduce my standard of living, move out of my house on the hill down to a little somethin' else I could afford and be cool and try to enjoy it."

"I would miss it but it wouldn't be something I could die from. Music is one phase of my life, but there'll be other phases."

"I probably have more success at music than I have at just being a man. I would rather improve on my capabilities to deal with life than my capability to come up with a melody and some words because that's fantasy . . . and it's gorgeous."

"It's nice to know," says Bill Withers, "I can buy a ticket and fly anywhere in the world, but unless I have my mind together enough to be sane and happy when I get there, I might as well stay where I am and be miserable."

CAUGHT IN THE ACT

Floyd's finest hour

PINK Floyd and Soft Machine stunned fans with two sensational shows at London's Rainbow Theatre on Sunday night. It was a splendid evening of rock-co-operation, in which both groups gave their services in aid of disabled drummer Robert Wyatt.

Compere John Peel was pleased to announce that some £10,000 was raised. He said that Robert intended to carry on with a singing and recording career. The ex-Softs drummer was not present but was acknowledged by cheers from the audience.

As two complex shows were performed on the same night, there were lengthy delays between sets which resulted in a certain amount of banter between the road crews and crowd. When the Softs finally came on for the second house, they were still dogged by sound problems. From my position near the right hand bank of speakers, only John Marshall's superb drumming could be heard with any clarity although the combined keyboard riffs of Karl Jenkins and Mike Ratledge, wove an insidious pattern of great power and menace.

The Softs employed a cataract of sound in which improvised solos seemed of less significance perhaps than the overall blitzkrieg, but John's drums employed a fascinating range of tones, and his attack was at times frightening.

There were no problems affecting the Floyd however, and they presented one of the best concerts seen this year; certainly one of the most imaginative and cleverly executed.

"Dark Side Of The Moon," their last album was the main basis of operations, and the Floyd faultlessly combined quadrophonic sound, pre-recorded tapes, lights, smoke and theatrical effects into a kind of rock Son of Lumiere.

There were many shocks and surprises along the way, and not having seen the Floyd for some time, I was frequently pinned back in my seat or ejected into the aisles, heart beating wildly.

Heartbeats in fact commenced proceedings, pulsating through the auditorium and stilling the more excitable elements in the crowd. Clocks ticked mysteriously and with perfect precision the Floydmen slotted their live instruments into the recorded sound.

The Floyd have a tremendous sense of pace. Occasionally they seem to overstate a theme or extract the last ounce from an idea, but the total effect is like coral growing on the seabed, establishing something deep, eternal and occasionally flashing with colour.

Overhead was suspended a huge white balloon to represent the moon, on which spotlights played, and not long after the performance began, searchlights began to pierce the gloom, and yellow warning lights began revolving in banks on the speaker cabinets.

Meanwhile the music continued apace, Mick Mason excelling with his terse, economical drums, hammering home the heavy stuff when required, and tastefully bringing down the volume when there a new tack or shift in course was signalled.

Dave Gilmour has one of the most difficult guitar jobs in rock, having to contain his own exuberance for the benefit of the greater whole, but making every note felt on his own inventive solos. Dave was particularly effective on the funky "Money" which should have been a single hit for 'lads.

Rick Wright's keyboards were immensely tasteful and melodic, gently spurred by Roger Waters' mighty bass lines. Instrumentally the Floyd are a finely tuned mechanism that surges ahead like an armoured cruiser, oblivious to the smoke of battle.

Indeed the band were enveloped in smoke throughout the performance, glowing red lights adding to the illusion of Inferno and hellfire. A choir of ladies cooed like angels, of mercy and as a silver ball reflecting myriad beams of light began to revolve and belch more smoke, the audience rose to give them an ovation. They deserved a Nobel prize, or at least an Oscar. — CHRIS WELCH.

SLY STONE

HOLLYWOOD: Will he? Won't he? Will he? Won't he? Sly Stone's reputation is too firmly etched for these questions not to be asked when he's advertised to appear anywhere in the USA. His tantrums and failures to show for concerts are legends to the extent where his contracts now contain a clause about a heavy penalty for non-appearance.

Well, Sly did show at the Palladium, but only just. The Palladium was sold out for the funky guy with the wild outfit and panama hat — but Sly made just a token appearance, leaving the stage after just over a half hour set, apparently satisfied that the customers had had their seven dollars' worth of entertainment. It was as big a rip-off as I've witnessed since I started reporting rock and roll.

Here's what happened. At 8 pm Papa John Creach, the opener, came on stage for a three-quarter hour's worth of acid/violin rock and roll. And he got an encore. At about 9.15 pm Bloodstone arrived with their soul/rock act which is both exciting and very visual — almost at cabaret standards. They played for about an hour, excluding one encore.

Just after 11 pm, the house lights dimmed after a long wait, during which over 5,000 fans had been asking that inevitable question. Yes, Sly was here, said the announcer, and on bounced the Family Stone followed by their erring leader. The music commenced a little shaky at first, until they found the rhythm of "Family Affair" and stuck to it.

No announcements preceded the next two numbers both of which were linked together, and after twenty minutes or so riffs of "Dance To The Music" could be heard faintly from the horn section. "Dance To The Music" it was and the audience did just that, revelling in Sly's presentation and sullen attitude.

Suddenly it stopped. Sly told the audience he wanted to have a party and broke into "I Want To Take You Higher" much to the delight of fans who were expecting this deluge of his to come later in the set. They were mistaken. It was late in the set. Everyone joined in, flinging their arms around and chanting "Higher" at the required time. Then Sly left the stage.

The band trooped off after him, except the drummer, who carried on as if to take a solo. Suddenly he left the stage too and apparently, the show was over. Slightly less than a half hour's music had been heard.

There was a dissatisfied yelling coming from the stage and the drummer re-appeared, commencing the same solo a second time. Two minutes and Sly re-appeared with band to give us two more choruses of "Higher", and wave to one and all in the manner usually associated with performers who have been on stage for a couple of hours or more. Then he disappeared and so did everyone else. The house lights went up and everyone went home surprisingly peaceably after what had occurred.

For what there was, the music was tight and entertaining. But other aspects of this show left me with a bitter taste in my mouth. Seven dollars is almost three pounds sterling for half an hour's music — the worst deal I've ever come across. — CHRIS CHARLESWORTH.

NEIL YOUNG

IT WAS Guy Fawkes night on Monday but at London's Rainbow Neil Young's performance was a damp squib. There were moments, but most of the act was frankly tedious. He talked too much about nothing and went on too long — over two hours. He made an ominous comment: "I play more than I talk so the more I talk the more I play."

Some walked out complaining he was boring, while the majority of the crowd must have been diehard fans indeed. The show was all but stolen by the Eagles, who played a professional, relaxed set in support.

Three-quarters of Young's act was electric, backed by the Santa Monica Flyers, the re-named Crazy Horse. The sound was lazy and loose, featuring Neil Loggins on piano and lead guitar and Ben Keith on slide.

A desultory hour passed with only half a dozen numbers. One song, "Please Take My Advice," stood out, with Young on acoustic guitar and harmonica and harmony vocals by Keith. The set apparently closed with a rambling jam on "Tonight's The Night," a number which had begun the performance.

He came back for another hour solo at first, and luckily things improved. He said he would be making a new album with Crosby, Stills and Nash in a couple of months and here was a song from it, "Misty Mountain." It was okay. Then some magic was infused into "Helpless."

When they finally got into "Don't Be Denied," it was a welcome relief. One wished there had been more numbers like that.

The Eagles, four Californians in London to record their third album, proved themselves extremely able musicians with a craftsmanlike attitude towards their rich harmony country music. There was sharp banjo picking and neat lead guitar from Glen Frey and Bernie Leadon. They could rock, too. Just as well. — JEFF WARD.

GILBERT O'SULLIVAN

I MUST admit I've never been a follower of Gilbert O'Sullivan, but on Monday night I had a chance to sit down and judge the man and his music at the beginning of his week-long stay at the London Palladium. The result was I left with mixed feelings.

On the plus side were his singles with fine arrangements and lyrics. The lyrics especially: he doesn't write from personal experience, but from a Walter Mitty situation and about other's experiences.

On songs like "Alone Again Naturally" it works. Other enjoyable moments came from "Get Down," "Clair" and my favourite, "Nothing Rhymed" which was sung with conviction and warmth.

Sadly, though, there were a lot of duff numbers — mostly from his albums — where the lyrics are more concerned with rhyming than saying anything very relevant. Even the music lost momentum and songs plodded along drearily and pointlessly. Gilbert's voice became an irritating drone.

If only Gilbert could come up with more like "Alone Again" he would then reach new heights, but his inconsistency may well let him down in future live shows.

Judged as a whole, the show was a success. The audience was delighted with Gilbert, and the London Palladium Orchestra under the direction of Johnny Spence gave excellent backing.

Add to this the singer's charming personality, his sincere regard for his fans and the excellent support given by the other acts, and the evening was quite a gas — even if not everything rhymed. — TONY CLAXTON.

HEAVY METAL KIDS

COSMO, when you come to think of it is a great name for a guitarist.

It's the name of the second guitarist in The Heavy Metal Kids, who've been on tour with Humble Pie and who, apparently, are Dave Dee's blue-eyed boys.

At the Birmingham Odeon last week Cosmo may've been playing guitar to match his name. You couldn't tell. The sound balance was dire, both guitars melted into an indistinct, uncomfortable blur. Pity that. Lead guitarist Mick Waller may well be the guy who used to play in an East End band called Mickey Finn. If it was him, I'd've dug to hear what he's playing like nowadays.

The drummer, Keith Boyce, was too loud and sounded stiff; the bassist, Ronnie Thomas, did nothing exciting.

Singer Gary Holt is a whole amalgam of every hard-rockin' English vocalist you'll care to think of.

He's aggressively Cockney (it was thus a mistake to put him down on the same bill as Steve Marriott, the original cockney rebel), shouting the odds, barking like a fairground caller. The kid's got East End style.

Holt gets to push his voice like Zep's Robert Plant, gets to wrap it around a word and comes on a bit like "Laughing Gnome" Bowie, bit like Newley's Artful Dodger, bit like Tommy Steele, the first of the cockney rock 'n' rollers.

The Heavy Metal Kids may have good material. The sound on Wednesday made it virtually impossible to evaluate its quality.

All I do know is that Gary

Holt's got the snotty cheek to either grab an audience or to immediately alienate it. What we arrived half were interested in Holt, half were heading for the bar.

The Kids even had the nerve to do an encore after the merest ripple of applause — an appalling version of "Shake." Watch Gary Holt, though, he'll maybe become the Pearly King of rock. The band I'll listen to when they get some separation of sound together. — GEOFF BROWN.

COCKNEY REBEL

ARE you ready for the sheer audacity of the Cockney Rebel? For it's on this that they seem to thrive. Students at Sheffield University on Saturday weren't sure about it, at first. It took a little time for them to be won over. But by the end of the set every foot in the place was stamping for more.

Cockney Rebel are five guys with posh, Palm Court-style names who all wear silk outfits with high boots and little toredador jackets. At first glance they appear camp but they're closer to circus.

They have a bravura singer in Stephen Harley who has a Keatonesque gait and manages somehow to be an amalgam of Presley, Dylan, Bowie, Lou Reed, Bryan Ferry and after all that, himself as well. Three of the others, Milton Reame-James (electric piano), the incredibly long-legged Jean-Paul Crocker (electric violin, mandolin, rhythm guitar) and Stuart Elliott (drums) hide behind dark glasses, deadpan expressions hardly changing. Bass guitarist Paul Avron Jeffries retires beneath a huge floppy brimmed hat. Notice that there's no lead guitarist.

After the stylish "Sebastian", the group's recent single, Harley asks: "Ain't that the best single you ever heard?" Audacious. Then an eyebrow-raising interpretation of Dylan's "Absolutely Sweet Marie". Crocker playing a rapid, fuzzy rhythm on electric guitar.

One hopes the group will not become merely an empty vehicle for Harley's excesses, as original as they may be. If they guard against this they could probably make it pretty big. Their kind of dash and vivacity is always welcome. — JEFF WARD.

New Orleans veteran dies

NEW ORLEANS banjo player Willie Baptiste died in hospital in his home town on October 16. He had lived in the city for many years with non-union bands, but was virtually unknown outside the Crescent City. He did, however, make one tour of Japan in May, 1970, as a member of Louis Nelson's band, and in that country recorded for Japanese Columbia. The session was released by NoLa Records last year. His only other recordings were with Doc Paulin's band, two tracks being issued on Lord Richard Ekin's La Croix label. Baptiste died in hospital after being admitted for tests.

ALTON PURNELL/

Purnell due

LOS ANGELES-based pianist Alton Purnell flies into Britain from Sweden on November 27 for a number of one-nighters. There are unconfirmed dates in London for November 27 and 28, Manchester (29), Rotherham (30), and further engagements are being set for December, among them one at London's 100 Club with Ken Colyer's band on December 5. Purnell leaves this country on December 6 for gigs in Belgium.

Nucleus date

IAN CARR'S Nucleus will perform Carr's recent major work "Labyrinth," at the Royal Northern College of Music in Manchester tomorrow (9) and at the Playhouse Theatre in Liverpool on Monday (12). The latter is the final concert in a series of five at the Playhouse series organised by the Merseyside Arts Association in an attempt to bring "the very best of present British Jazz" to the area. "Labyrinth" was given its premiere in London during March.

Abbott benefit

MANY Manchester musicians are donating their services for a benefit session at the Cumberland Club next Wednesday (14) to aid the widow and family of tenor saxist/clarinetist Alf Abbott. Abbott, a founder member of the Derek Atkins Dixielanders way back in the late 1940s, died from a heart attack recently at the comparatively early age of 48.

Blackwell ill

MUCH MORE sad news is to hand of U.S. drummer Ed Blackwell, now ill with a kidney disease (as reported here on October 27). It appears that he has lost the use of both his kidneys and needs to go on a dialysis machine five days a week, the alternative being a kidney transplant which would be very expensive in the USA. And Blackwell has a wife and three children to support. Ornette Coleman is preparing a series of benefit concerts for his drummer, and an appeal has been launched here by John Stevens, Valerie Wilmer and Martin Davidson. Contributions, large or small, should be sent to M. Davidson at 154 Inchmery Road, London, SE6.

Going Dutch

THE Cornish All-Stars traditional jazz band has been invited to play at the Dutch Festival of Jazz in the spring of next year. This surprise invitation followed a visit by a holidaymaker to their club in Penzance. The band has now moved to its winter venue, playing at the Mounts Bay Hotel, Penzance seafront, each Thursday night.

Mini-fest

JOHN Schofield is preparing a week of jazz at Edinburgh's Traverse theatre club from November 13, included in his billing are Derek Bailey and the London Musicians Co-op: Howard Riley, Paul Rutherford, Paul Lytton, Eddie Prevost, Lou Gare and Frank Perry who will be performing during the week in assorted groups and variations, along with Gunter Christmann and Dittel Shonenburg who are travelling from Germany for the mini-festival.

Also from Germany will be ragtime pianist Rosa Lytwinoff, and a number of local bands, Nucleus, Head and Proprioception will be playing.

EX-Maynard Ferguson trumpeter Barry Whitworth makes the trip from Sheffield to the Midland Hotel, West Didsbury, Manchester, to guest with the John Rotherham Trio on Sunday (11). On the same day there is a star line-up for a concert at the Whitworth Civic Hall, near Rochdale, when George Chisholm, Danny Moss, Joannie Labe and the Tony Lee Trio all appear. The Roy Mac Big Band will play a selection of the music of Herman Miller, Ellington and Basie at El Patio in the Arndale Centre, Stratford, Manchester, on Monday (12).

NOVEMBER attractions at the Boldmere Jazz Club, Sutton Coldfield are Ken Rattenbury (yesterday, Wednesday), George Huxley's Jazzband (14), Perdido Street Jazzmen (21) and Gene Connors from the USA guesting with the Mardi Gras Society Band from Stoke. Albion Music presents a concert by Iskra 1903 (Rutherford, Bailey and Guy) plus Gunter Christmann (tombone) and Dittel Schoenenburg (percussion) at London's Unity Theatre on Monday (19). The Terry Seymour Big Band plays the Plough at 90 London, SW9, Sunday evening.

THE Newcastle Big Band is now resident at the Guildhall, Newcastle, for Sunday lunchtime concerts. The move has come about due to the size of their following... A Dixieland-mainstream outfit, unnamed as yet but co-led by singer Sheila Giles and trumpeter Ronnie Young has replaced the Sinter group (from the ranks of the Newcastle Big Band) at the Gosforth Hotel on Thursdays... A new weekly jazz session has begun at the Hawthorn Inn, Benwell Village, Newcastle, with the Phoenix Jazzmen supplying the music.

TALISKER is broadcasting tomorrow (Friday) on Radio Three's Jazz Workshop at 4.55 pm. The programme will include a suite of traditional Scottish tunes. With Ken Hyder (drums) are John Rangecroft (tenor and flute), Ken Eley (tenor soprano), Dick Pearce (flugel) and Lindsay Cooper (bass). Singer Maggie Nichols, not on this broadcast, has now joined Talisker.

BARBARA THOMPSON visits the Old General Hotel headquarters of the Nottingham Jazz Orchestra this Sunday (11) as guest artist... The Southerners from Hertfordshire will be playing Dixieland jazz at the Brewery Tap, Ware, on Saturday (10)... Brighton's Benny Simkins Sextet plays the Fox and Hounds, Haywards Heath, on Sunday evening (11) after an absence of six months... PROPOS our item of October 20 regarding trombonist Louis Nelson and the Strathdon Hotel, Nottingham, the general manager, James Millar, writes to suggest we get the facts correct before printing them. "You report that the Hotel and myself, the management, were unable to accommodate some extra 50 people at the function," he says. "I would stress that it was agreed with Mr Chris Burke that there would be a limit of 120 persons, which is in accordance with the limitations given to us by the Fire Authorities." Glad to clear up any misunderstanding.

SUNDAY night jazz has returned to Alrechurch, near Birmingham, with the reappearance of the Jubilee Jazzmen at the San... lex Welsh plays the Kendal Jazz Club on Monday (12) (11)

Who curb ticket rush

JACOBA ATLAS
in Los Angeles

WHEN certain rock groups come to town, Los Angeles more or less goes bananas. This time it's the Who, selling tickets to their first LA appearance in a couple of years and driving the fans crazy.

The Forum was once again the scene of hungry fans hoping for a precious seat. With the Who, most got what they wanted — the group had written into their contracts that no one person could purchase more than two tickets. Although other groups like the Rolling Stones had made similar requests, this is the first time the tickets had been limited as low as two per person. Naturally all 18,000 were sold.

Tammy Wynette made a major hit singing about a divorce; now it looks as if her picture perfect marriage to country and western star George Jones is on the rocks. Columbia Records were unable to confirm the story, but a spokesman for the company said they thought it might be true. Tammy and George are currently top of the C&W charts with a love duet called "We're Gonna Hang On."

Anne Murray as sined Alice Cooper's manager as her very own but denies the rumour that she'll follow any of Alice's antics in her own act.

Chris Hillman and John David Souther are up in Boulder, Colorado working on material for a new album.

Don Kirshner is planning a television tribute to the late Jim Croce, including previously unreleased tapes of the singer and a good deal of commentary by Croce's associates.

Grace Slick's first solo album is called "Manhole" and will either be released in early November or after Christmas.

Garfunkel has a gold album of his very own, for "Angel Clare."

Bette Midler saying lovely things about Judy Garland to the press after it was announced the Devine Miss M. had broken Judy's Palace record. Although it's been rumoured that Bette is talking to director Mike Nichols about her movie debut, so far nothing definite has been set.

Bonnie Raitt might just make the big step into stardom with her current stint at the Troubadour. She's there for a week with Danny O'Keef.

Blues Project: final gig

from LORAIN ALTERMAN in New York

HOWARD STEIN's presentation of the New York Dolls at a Halloween costume party in the Waldorf-Astoria's grand ballroom got out of hand when between 100 and 200 gate crashers, mixing with late arriving ticket holders, were held back by panicky hotel management people.

The problem was solved by Stein allowing them all into the 2,000-capacity ballroom, which had an advance sale of 2/3 of capacity so was not overcrowded.

The Dolls, originally scheduled to perform around midnight, didn't get on stage until 2 am.

Wayne County, all blue and red ruffles with a blonde and pink wig, outshone most of the other revellers. Winners of the costume contest were a pair all decked out in silver lame. They won a night out on the town with the Dolls.

I also loved the guy outfitted as a Christmas tree with his body painted gold under a green leotard and a Christmas tree head-dress dripping with gold balls.

Earlier that evening the Blues Project performed at Avery Fisher (nee Philharmonic) Hall and at a party afterwards guitarist Steve Katz said this was the last date for the reunited group, who would once again go their separate ways. Lynyrd Skynyrd opened the show and are a band to watch.

Alice Cooper's short Deember tour in the States has run into trouble in Binghamton, NY, where the board of directors of the Brooke County Veterans Memorial Arena decided to cancel the show on the grounds that the community wasn't ready for it.

ZZ Top sharing some of the Alice dates and, by all accounts, is becoming one of the top hard rock acts in the country. You don't know what loud is until you've heard them.

Crosby and Nash checked into the Capitol Theater in New Jersey on November 7 and then move on to do some mid-west dates.

The Edgar Winter six-week, 25-city American tour now underway has a potential gross of more than million dollars.

B. B. King is getting together a blues appreciation society with himself as chairman of the advisory board. The society will try to take the blues to new audiences.

Richie Havens presented a pre-Thanksgiving concert at Avery Fisher Hall on November 7. It was an evening music involving 20 singers and performers, who will on to tour the US Europe next month.

Frank Sinatra will perform his November 18 TV special on a stage made up on two giant turntables.

Burt Bacharach, who has his own special for TV coming up in January, has just released a new album "Living Together."

JAZZ

from JEFF ATTERTON in New York

NOVEMBER 16 will mark the 100th anniversary of the birth of W. C. Handy, distinguished American composer, trumpeter and "Father of the Blues," who died in New York in 1958 at the age of 84. Several major Handy concerts — including one at the Yale University School of Music — have been scheduled for that day, and the mayor of New Orleans has proclaimed November 16 as W. C. Handy Day.

There will be a parade and massive benefit concert in Florence, Ala., Handy's birthplace, while in Memphis, Tenn., celebrations for the famed composer will begin on November 9 with a memorial concert as well as parties, receptions and dances. The celebrations will conclude in New York with a fund-raising dinner at the Americana Hotel on November 30. Featured at the event will be the crowning of "Miss St. Louis Blues." All proceeds will go to the Handy museum and Handy scholarships. Handy's old home in Alabama was salvaged, restored and dedicated along with a museum in 1970. Exhibits in the museum include the piano on which he composed "Beale Street Blues"; his trumpet; several manuscripts; a statue; and various plaques.

JAZZ Adventures, Inc., the non-profit organization which has presented more than 400 concerts featuring top jazz names at N.Y.'s St. Regis, Maisonette and Jimmy's, began a series of lunch concerts and kicked off with drummer Bobby in the Chateau Madrid, located downstairs in the Lexington Hotel. Rhoda Scott, the barefoot organ lady, will make her U.S. debut on November 9 accompanied by reedman Frank Wess and drummer Freddie Watts.

THE Thad Jones-Mel Lewis String Quartet and the Vermeer Joint Quartet will perform a joint concert on November 11 at N.Y.'s Brooklyn Academy of Music. The programme is the first in a monthly series of jazz-classical concerts at the Academy.

ALTO saxist Phil Woods leading a quartet at Half-Note alternating with Baker's quintet, which making its third appearance at the club. The Earl "Fatha" Hines quintet follows the Hackett sextet into the Roy Box on November 12.

SAL SALVADOR, who played guitar with Stan Kenton's orchestra 20 years ago, and Allen Hanlon, a guitarist in Norvo's band during the 60's era, are currently performing duets at The Guitar on Second Avenue at 24th Street.

CHICK COREA and Return Forever have completed their second album for Polygram Records titled "Hymn of Seventh Galaxy." It is set for immediate release and reports are sensational. The group recently played a sell-out concert at N.Y.'s Avery Hall.

THEY said it would never happen.

Grand Funk Railroad, the band we all loved to hate, have made a comeback — and despite all their problems, problems which would have sunk most bands without trace, they are riding on the crest of a popularity wave in the US, which seems bigger than anything they've enjoyed before.

Grand Funk's new single and album — both titled "We're An American Band" — have swept across the country like the group's previous efforts; only this time there's a difference: their mentor, manager, and millionaire guru Terry Knight has nothing to do with it.

Grand Funk's recent history has been well documented in an endless stream of court injunctions against the group, all placed by the aforesaid Mr Knight, who, up until their divorce a year and a half ago, was their producer and manager.

Knight had steered the group's career, making all the decisions and, presumably, reaping much of the profits.

Despite the enormous critical abuse heaped on Grand Funk, Knight remained resolute about their musical integrity.

Whether or not they were ever talented musicians is open to debate, but the proof of Knight's success with GFR lay in a series of platinum albums and concert attendance records all over the USA. It seemed a happy, and fruitful, partnership.

But in 1971 the smooth sailing stopped.

No one is saying exactly why it happened, but Terry Knight and GFR parted company.

Some say it was a row over money (and there was plenty of that around) and others that it had to do with the musicians' constant desire to be accepted by critics as well as fans.

But they couldn't just shake hands and say goodbye. Knight, it transpired, owned the copyright on the name "Grand Funk Railroad," and refused to allow the former group to continue using the title.

They did, and the court injunctions followed. Equipment was impounded, and lawsuits amounting to sums in the region of 40 million dollars were thrown around, mostly by Knight.

There was also the hype factor, which must have troubled the band, although it did nothing to diminish their bank accounts.

Lawsuits or not, Knight was no longer involved with the group in a managerial or functional capacity, and everyone predicted the end of the line for the group.

It was a more than reasonable prediction: after all, Knight had been as big a factor in the group's success as the band themselves, perhaps even more so.

But the band carried on. They released their eighth album "Phoenix," and went on tour again despite the court injunctions intended to prevent them from appearing.

Then came a meeting with Todd Rundgren and the latest album which has been their most successful ever. To make the fairy story even more glossy, Grand Funk broke yet more attendance records on their last US tour. The fans, it seems, have kept the faith.

They've also added a fourth member to the band, organist Craig Frost, who was with Mark Farner and Don Brewer in the Pack, the group that spawned Grand Funk in the first place and which included Knight as vocalist.

And the duties in the new, Knight-less GFR are now spread evenly among the four musicians, unlike their former years when the spotlight was firmly shining down on guitarist Farner.

Drummer Don Brewer was reluctant to talk about the break-up with Knight when he called me from Detroit, the group's home town, last week.

"I really can't go into it until the court case has been heard," he said. "We are hoping that everything will come to trial in January or February, and then it'll be settled for all time. The sooner the better as far as we're concerned."

Isn't life Grand!

Brewer was more willing to talk about the addition of Craig Frost and the group's musical aspirations.

The last time the band actually saw Terry Knight was when he appeared before the group's show at Madison Square Gardens on their last tour but one, about nine months ago. He arrived with an injunction to impound the group's equipment. Since then they have only communicated through lawyers.

New manager is Andy Cavaliere, their former road manager.

"He was with us for about two years before we asked him to become the proper manager."

"To step up from road manager to actual manager is quite a task, but he has done it and made a good job of it."

And Frost: "Many years ago Craig was with us in the group called the Pack. When the Pack disbanded, Craig went into another group and Mark and I formed Grand Funk Railroad."

"A year and a half ago, we decided we wanted a fourth member and we decided to get Craig. It was like reverting back to our roots. Craig has been with us on the last two albums now."

"We met Todd Rundgren through our publicist Lynn Goldsmith, and he just came down to the studio and offered to help."

"We don't know whether he's going to do any more albums with us as nothing was signed, but he helped us a lot. People thought it was very unusual for someone like Rundgren to be working with a band like us, but it's turned out for the better."

Brewer admitted that the group thought about splitting when the Knight problems began.

"But the problem wasn't within the group," he said. "Everyone in the group was still together, and the problems were on the outside. We couldn't split up as we were still together musically."

A follow-up album to "We're An American Band" is in the works already, and they're hoping for release around January.

"I'll probably be just a progression of what has gone down before. With each album, we've tried to carry on some progression a little further. Each one is a little more experimental than the last."

They're also hoping to make their second visit to Europe next year, although nothing definite has been confirmed yet.

"We are planning to go back to England next year, but it's a little premature to talk about it as so many things stand in our way."

"The only tour that is concrete is one of the US in February and March. It involves a lot of time to go over to Europe, and with having to get two albums out a year we've never had time to get there as often as we'd like to have done."

"I enjoyed the show we did two years ago at Hyde Park though."

The new surge in popularity came as a complete surprise to the band, says Brewer.

"We didn't know what to expect after all the hassles, or how the fans would react to all the publicity that went on. Everybody seems to have accepted us for what we are. To us, it's like starting all over again."

"I think the band is better now than it's ever been."

"It's a true band in the sense of the word. Everyone plays to enhance the others, rather than one guy standing out all the time which was the case before. Mark was always out at the front. Now everybody is on an equal footing."

Brewer admitted that the GRAND FUNK: "We couldn't split up. We were still together musically" lack of critical acclaim has been off-putting to the group, although the fans had reacted well.

"I think it's fantastic that some critics are actually saying nice things about us at last. Before, we had to be satisfied with what the people did, and they're really the ones that count. But it still got us down to hear the critics and the people in the industry all knocking us." The group's act is continually changing. Although they retain some of the old favourites like "Closer To Home" and "Heartbreaker," new numbers are appearing all the time.

"I can see the time coming when the act will be all recent material. The fans who came to see us when we had the early albums out have probably grown out of us now, so the acts consist mainly of stuff from the last three or four records."

"There's a new generation of rock 'n' rollers to consider and they want new material."

"There is still a lot of action on stage, but not quite as much deliberate sexy movement with guitars. We are more into creating the music, whereas before we were more concerned about the atmosphere."

"It's more laid back, although we now carry a screen behind the stage with films of locomotives before we come on stage."

"Craig may be contributing to the writing in future as well; at present he just helps a lot with the arrangements of songs. There's far less pressure on everybody now he's in the group. I don't have to worry too much about filling in the holes that there used to be in the act."

As a final revolt against their past, they've also dropped the Railroad part of their name. Now they're just simple Grand Funk — hoping to settle their differences and begin again on a new track.

Steve Lake reports from the giant European festival

THERE were some strange vibes in Berlin last weekend, and that's not a reference to Gary Burton's uninspired playing, but rather a comment on reactions and undercurrents that permeated the 1973 Jazz Festival.

To a visitor to Germany, the festival is of course, a fantastic opportunity to hear a wide variety of jazz styles, including some that England rarely hears — like the music of Richard Abrams, the surprise hit of the festival.

Plenty were saying that there was not enough representation of contemporary European jazz, and that's true, but the nightly avant-garde concerts at the Cafe Quartier Latin in Potsdamer Strasse more than took care of that.

Bizarre is the only word to describe the Berlin audience, however. Promoters, journalists and musicians alike were totally perplexed by reactions. Duke Ellington was booed off, and at least half the acts were heckled.

It seemed that the Berliners understand only two reactions, either they love you or they hate you; there's no middle ground.

Local musicians condemn the festival as an exploitative and politically-motivated organisation, put together to simply repair Berlin's tarnished image, but whatever the reasoning behind it, the artists are chosen with care, and the music more than justifies the festival's existence.

Below is a detailed account of the way it happened . . .

Thursday

TYPICAL of the festivals' adventurous organisation, the first band to play was the Peter Brotzmann Quartet, featuring the German saxophone genius on alto, tenor and bass-sax. Alex von Schlippenbach (piano), Peter Kowald (bass), and Paul Lovens (drums).

Brotzmann, of course, begins at the point where most players climax, hurling himself immediately into an atonal frenzy, with dog-whistle high freak notes, until his cheeks turned scarlet and his eyes bulged in their sockets.

His band was equally uncompromising. Schlippenbach at one point scraping the inside of the grand piano with a large cowbell, while Lovens and Kowald engaged in a whole series of reflex action duets.

The crowd reaction seemed totally favourable, and the further out that Brotzmann went, the more the audience seemed to lap it up. Surprising, in view of the fact that the Philharmonie contained a real cross section of the public, ranging from mini-skirted young girls to doddering old men.

Still hopefully the positiveness of their response augers well for the future of free jazz.

Peter Kowald returned to play in the next set, having exchanged his double bass for a tuba to perform with Karl Berger's Music Universe, an interesting collective performance group featuring Karl Berger (vibes/piano/balaphone), Sam Rivers and Carlos Ward (reeds), Albert Mangelsdorff (trombone), Kowald (tuba), Frederick Rzewski (piano), Dave Holland (bass), and a three-man percussion section with Bobby Moses, Makaya Ntshoko and Klaus Hagl.

Rivers and Mangelsdorff were particularly riveting, the latter obviously a local hero, but the music wasn't a

MILES DAVIS: splitting opinion down the middle platform for solo expression, rather a vehicle for Berger's writing.

The ensemble received an ovation, and Karl, looking like William Tell in a black velvet smock top, bounced back on stage for a very brief piano solo that finished so abruptly that MC Ronnie Scott was caught unawares.

And then Miles, splitting audience opinion down the middle. Those that worried about whether it was jazz or not obviously missed out but the more open-minded folk got off on the tense, muscular electronic music.

Miles looked incredible, conducting his group with the subtlest of gestures, sartorially super-cool in tight-fitting black suit, huge blue shades and a long, long white silk scarf.

Dave Leibman on saxes is a greatly improved player, (how long before he starts his own off-shoot band?), and Mike Henderson is definitely a world-beater.

Miles didn't play too much trumpet, and when he did it was always through the wah-wah pedal, often sounding more like a guitar than a horn.

But that in itself was interesting, and his rapport with guitarists Casey and Lucas was pretty amazing.

Friday

IF THURSDAY was a triumph, Friday was a disaster. Headlined "Cotton Club Revisited," what should have been an engaging and good-natured evening's music degenerated into a frightening example of Teutonic hostility.

Things began smoothly enough with a very light-weight set from Louis Jordan's Timpany Five, and Jordan, tenorist Irv Cox and pianist Duke Burrell camped their way through some slick rehearsed humour and some slick rehearsed music.

The humour fell on deaf ears, due to language difficulties I suppose, but the music was warmly received, especially the unexpected inclusion of Kristofferson's "Help Me Make It Through The Night."

It was Duke Ellington's set that was the fiasco. Right from the start it seemed fated.

Ronnie Scott had the embarrassing job of introducing the Duke three times before the old man finally appeared, and his band were walking on and off stage looking confused.

Ellington finally showed and played a couple of trio ballads with Joe Benjamin on bass, and Quentin White on drums, before the rest of the orchestra came on.

En masse, they seemed a little shaky, although there were some good solos, notably from Harry Carney who contributed a lovely baritone feature.

But Duke's blunder, as far as Berlin was concerned, was the introduction of singer Toney Watkins. Jeezus, the crowd HATED him.

Every vocal inflection met with a torrent of abuse. Derisive whistlings, boos, hissings and jeers eventually drowned out the unfortunate fellow, and he fled for the safety of the wings, closely followed by the grim-faced Ellington band.

Quite why Watkins was so unanimously despised I couldn't say, he seemed to me to be a fairly acceptable mainstream jazz singer. Germany clearly didn't think so.

The next set was supposed to be tap-dancer Baby Laurence with the Duke Ellington Trio, but apparently the Duke didn't feel too good after his rough handling by the crowd, and understandably declined to go back on.

A stand-in arrived in the shape of George Wein, famous Newport Jazz Festival promoter, who deputised for the Duke at the piano, but obviously Wein couldn't really cut it with the Ellington rhythm section.

Brave try though, Rattling furiously out front, Baby Laurence proved that he could play drums with the soles of his feet better than a lot of guys can utilising all limbs.

Even so, an impromptu exchange of phrasings between Baby and Quentin White proved rather disastrous, the drummer not grasping what was required of him.

Thus, after only two brief numbers, Laurence quit the stage and the audience rose to its feet for another bout of booing, shouting what I understand is the German equivalent of "Rip-Off!"

Feeling desperately starved of worthwhile music, I took a taxi over to Berlin's Quartier Latin, where the "Alternative Total Music Meeting '73," known locally as the "Anti-Festival" was in full swing.

Just being there was a phenomenal experience. If you can imagine the Marquee at its most sweaty, crowded and smoky, with a really enthusiastic and sympathetic audience, then you'll have an idea of the atmosphere.

But the music that the kids are grooving to isn't heavy metal rock, or Tama Motown, it's free jazz. And it's a beautiful sight to see so many smiles as guys like Brotzmann played their music, putting the lie to the English theory that the New Music is "too intellectual."

In the few hours that I was there I saw the Frank Wright Quartet, featuring Bobby Few, Alan Silva and Mohammed Ali, steaming ahead at full throttle throughout an orgasmic set — plus Brotzmann, van Hove and Bennink performing their very funny free pieces, and best of all, Globe Unity.

This is a fourteen piece European jazz ensemble that includes our own Evan Parker and Paul Rutherford, as well as noted continentals like Manfred Schoof, Brotzmann, Kowald, Schlippenbach, Lovens, Bushi Niebergall, and Gunter Christmann.

Parker told me afterwards that it was the first time the band had ever played collective total improvisation, in which case the set was doubly great — roaring jungle choruses exploding simultaneously from all the horns. Very powerful music.

Saturday

THIS was the first night to feature two different concerts in the same evening, a modern bill at 1900 hours, with Keith Jarrett, Ralph Towner, and Joe Farrell, and a neo-modern job with Woody Herman and Peter Herbolzheimer at 2300 hours.

The early concert was a moderate success, although again audience reaction was inexplicable. The Jarrett quintet, featuring Dewey Redman (reeds), Charlie Haden (bass), Paul Motian (drums), and Guillermo Franco (percussion), played a humble, sometimes halting set, with Jarrett playing more of the marimba-like osidrone than piano.

Franco was just a distraction, armed with literally hundreds of percussive devices, he seemed to feel obliged to play all of them, at the expense of the music's continuity.

Clearly Jarrett didn't feel too happy about either the music or the response to it, for he refused an encore, stepping to the mike to say only "Those who want to save Berlin — please try."

The highlight of the night was definitely Ralph Towner's solo acoustic performance on classical and twelve-string guitars.

Ralph doesn't somehow seem the sort of man that would play anything with finesse — he's big and gangling, almost clumsy. But he transformed the Philharmonie into a place of reverent church-like attention, and the silence in the auditorium during his set was almost awesome. Musically, Towner is utilising acoustic guitar in a way new to jazz — playing with a pianist's sensibilities, and his improvisations were uniformly beautiful, as he created the illusion of keeping lead and bass parts going simultaneously.

A one man jamming chamber ensemble.

Then the Joe Beck/Joe Farrell Quartet, who received a barracking from one section of the audience for their rock-orientated music.

Drummer Steve Gadd is a very dynamic, hard player who really rocks the tubs, bassist Herb Bushler is fittingly imaginative, and the band suits Farrell's reed style far more than Return Forever did.

Roxy: an air of lush decay

ROXY MUSIC "Stranded" (Island) Without intending to notch up critical scores, I still think little of Bryan Ferry's solo album and that his single is a good idea taken to inordinate lengths.

I mention this because it seems to me that what he lacks in interpretive talent he more than compensates for with a highly idiosyncratic and original intelligence.

It's not unreasonable, I think, to argue that he's the most interesting figure in British pop at present in that he and Roxy Music are offering an individual viewpoint that bears little relation to the work of their contemporaries or indeed rock artists who've gone before. "Stranded" is Roxy's third album, and immeasurably the best so far, because it's more cohesive in outlook (understandable in view of the length of time they've now been together and the fact that the departure of Eno has removed a divisory influence). It's certainly not a masterpiece, but it's not that far from it. Moreover, it contains one track that most definitely is — "A Song For Europe" — which is a kind of rock chanson, voluptuous in its cadences of a remembered affaire and, expressive of the decaying grandeur of a fading camelia, for all it's Parisian setting, it could be sub-titled "Death In Venice"; not only is the mood appropriate but Ferry exhibits the exquisite sensibilities of a Visconti without the stodge. It takes an Englishman to render accessible the accents of Continental music, after all. As a whole, though, Roxy Music evoke on this album an impression of lush melancholy, full of elusive bitter-sweet fragrances. I can see why some critics find it hard to like them while appreciating what they do. Their music isn't warm or embracing; here it's suffused with an exotic, Poe-like quality that distances the creators from their listener, while Ferry's strange voice lends it the chill bloom of the corpse. This can have marvellously eerie results, as on "Mother Of Pearl," which begins with a fast, curiously elliptical riff that's almost Beefheartian and then blows chilly with Ferry near-reciting monologue that's as desolating as it's impenetrable. The same song also points up his phrasing and ear for nuance, as in the beautifully effete line, "I've been up all night, partymaking is too much fun" — which could have come straight out of Aldous Huxley's "Point Counter Point" (it's stretching the literary parallels, but Ferry seems eminently literate for a rock musician). It's unfortunate that Warner Brothers haven't renewed their contract in America because Roxy Music would seem ideally poised for that kind of international expansion.

There is a baroque and inventive talent, and "Stranded," only fails to be a true tour de force because some of the inventive ideas don't quite come off. "Psalm," for example, is a very odd liturgy with its Blackpool pier organ and doctored harmonica sound, but it's hard to sustain interest over eight minutes on the strength of bizarreness alone. Ferry's writing is wonderfully atmospheric, but his theme as a lyricist is unclear. Still, as with all tales of mystery and imagination, doubtless it will one day be revealed. — M.W.

NAZARETH: "Loud 'n' Proud" (Mooncrest). Naz are becoming adventurous, this album infused with much more originality than its predecessor "Razamanaz." They've slowed the pace, thought out direction, and become that much more individual. Technically, they won't stop you in your tracks, but there are ideas moving. The record has obviously been recorded on two levels: side one reflects their current stage sound; hard (though not heavy), impetuous, raunchy rock — and it's interesting to realise how far they employ, in disguise, the techniques of the classic rock 'n' roll traditions: Chuck Berry, Bo Diddley, Eddie Cochran. But side two is experimental. Listen, especially, to a version of Dylan's "Ballad of Hollis Brown" — "an evil song" says singer Dan McCafferty. Well, if it wasn't before it sure is now. An X-certificate track: eleven minutes of manic claustrophobia (just hear it on cans). It's dry, airless, quite uncharacteristic. Unusual, too, is the preceding "Child in the Sun" as near a ballad as Naz are likely to get, featuring strong, structured harmonies. Of course, the third number on face two is "This Flight Tonight," still probably the best track on the album. Roger Glover's production has caught the band at their best. Notable is Manny Charlton's subtle control of feedback, which is finally loosed like a banshee into the fade. Surprisingly, as an adaptation of the Joni Mitchell original, it works. Returning to side one, one finds the basic ingredients of the group's success: immediacy, uniformity, volume. No effort is required of the audience. McCafferty's voice is the cutting instrument, his vocal range reaching chilly crazy heights, thought tempered by Charlton's conciliatory guitar. "Turn On Your Receiver," a growing stage hit, trucks well. "Teenage Nervous Breakdown" leaps and lurches. Dan curls his lip (examination reveals a pretentious lyric quite unfitting to Naz, but it's the only track not written by them). "Freewheeler" conks the best. — J.W.

LINDA RONSTADT: "Don't Cry Now" (Asylum). Looking as she does, an impossibly cuddly chicklet, it's easy to forgive Linda Ronstadt any musical deficiencies. But this album, in fact her first on Asylum, shows off her musical measurements to the very best advantage. Essentially an interpreter of others' songs, she's handpicked ten that suit her warmly expressive range, tinged slightly with rich melancholy. Three of these, including the title cut, are by her old man, John D. Souther; then there's the Eagles' "Desperado," Rick Roberts' "Colorado," Randy Newman's "Sail Away" and Neil Young's "I Believe In You" among the rest. The arrangements are never less than elegant and full-bodied, the musicianship ridiculously accomplished — just to single out one, Ed Black's steel work on "Silver Threads And Golden Needles" is at least half the track. But Miss Ronstadt's voice is what this record is about. Her roots are in country music, and although this is far from being a country album, she retains that sense of acheingness which nags at the heart of the best C. and W. She's blessedly free, however, of that whining tone attendant upon much country music. She's immensely melodic, with the pure phrasing of a cherub, but womanly and mature. At times she recalls Joan Baez, but her overall tone is rounder, without soaring so high. The Neil Young song sets her off beautifully. While it never reaches those yearning heights of the original, and therefore isn't so personal, it becomes something very human and healing. On a less successful note, she isn't quite able to handle the Randy Newman song because it requires a less open, more guarded quality than her voice is capable of; she makes it a very passable love song but misses its ironies. Still, this is my favourite Linda Ronstadt album. She seems to be finding a new lease of life on Asylum. — M.W.

albums Smokey's belief in Miracles

SMOKEY ROBINSON: "Smokey"; THE MIRACLES: "Renaissance" (both Tamla Motown). Together they made such sweet music — separately they don't fare so badly either. When Smokey announced his final split many felt it was all over for the Miracles and the world was about to lose just about the best voice in contemporary black music.

Smokey's solo album proves quite conclusively that away from the Miracles' lush, supportive backgrounds he's still an original, an absolute prince.

The Miracles sans Smokey fare reasonably well. Robinson's successor, William Griffin, has a voice (and face) remarkably similar to his predecessor, which though in the earliest stages may make the change easier could develop into something of a handicap in his later career. Smokey's album is a gem because he writes so perfectly for his own high, caressing tone. The Miracles album is flawed because the material is often just not quite there — like aiming for a bullseye and hitting the outer bull. Smokey's album progresses smoothly because he and Willie Hutch are the only producers and there are but three arrangers. The Miracles album isn't so comfortable a set because they use ten producers (Smokey is "executive producer") and eight arrangers — variations in treatment aren't outrageously obvious, but the tracks often "sit" awkwardly with each other. Willie Hutch and Marvin Gaye-produced tracks ("I Wanna Be With You" and "I Didn't Realise The Show Was Over" for the former; "I Love You Secretly" the latter) are about the best. Miracles efforts and there are no real stinkers. When they fully incorporate Griffin and he stamps his own authority on the group they'll be way out front again I'm sure. The giveaway on the album is the Willie Mitchell deep snare drum sound. When in doubt dive deep. But Smokey's album, is excellent. The Miracles' backings aren't missed at all — just goes to show how much Robinson's artistry dominated the group. Though I'm not very struck on his versions of "Will You Love Me Tomorrow" and the medley "Never Can Say Goodbye" there a wealth of his own and co-written songs and each is a peach. "Holly" — pretty young chick gone bad; "Silent Partner In A Three-Way Love Affair" — eternal triangle revisited; "Just My Soul Responding" — downtrodden races rise up; "Wanna Know My Mind" — sit off mah back woman; "The Family Song" — two guys in two gals get it on; "Baby Come Close" — seduction with style. Isaac Hayes take note. The one track I've left out is "Sweet Harmony." It's Smokey's farewell and tribute to the Miracles. Part of verse two runs: "I believe in miracles, if you can dream it, it can be done/And though the task was made for two/It can be done well by one." And to turn his words on him — Smokey, go on and blow on, spread your joy around the world. — G.B.

AMERICA: "Hat Trick" (Warner Bros). If America, the country, were in as good a shape as its namesake group, the world would sure be a better place. America — Gerry Beckley, Dewey Bunnell, Dan Peek — have packed their third album (hence the title) with material of the highest quality and each of the eleven tracks is stamped with distinction. There is a pervading mood of gentle nostalgia. For "Hat Trick" is the materialisation of a notion America have been expanding and working on for more than two years. The 8½-minute title track tells how the three "Americans" met, and is the only song in the group's repertoire to which all three have contributed compositions. Additional background vocals are supplied to the track by Carl Wilson and former Beach Boy Bruce Johnston. It's a colourful performance, comprising several short, interconnected movements. Another song, Gerry's "Submarine Ladies" featuring romantic harmonica and banjo, also dates to the same period. All other songs are freshly written. Guest artists include Joe Walsh whose guitar work on "Green Monkey" and "She's Gonna Let You Down" is particularly tasty. Appetising too, are Jim Ed Norman's piano and orchestral arrangement of the latter number.

Other guests are jazz drummer Hal Blaine and Robert Margolise who played synthesiser on Stevie Wonder's "Innervisions" album.—J.W.

BARRY (BAZZA) CROCKER: "Bazza McKenzie's Party Songs" (Transatlantic). Right then, mates, break out a few ice cold tubes — and pass me a frostie while you're at it. Jeez, one more of these and I'll have to go for the big spit. Now what was I going to say — no, fair crack of the whip, fellers, no technical yawns on the carpet. This pommy landlord'll be charging me £50 to get it cleaned — these poms skin you worse than the flamin' gippos. Anyway, sports, you'll probably be gathering that a few mates from God's Own Country are having a party in me Earls Court bed-sit. The amber fluid's flowing like water — could go a snakes meself — and there're a few sheilas here who'll go off like a tin of bad fish. And the music? "Bazza McKenzie's Party Songs" of course — a bit of rock, a few songs from the Old Country, a touch of the old sentimentals and a lot of naughty. You can stick your pommy rugby songs up a kookaburra's khyber! If you're want a real party, just get this one on your turntables. Anyway, mates, shake stop — just off to shake hands with the wife's best friend. And that sheila is winking at me; better hurry and stick a can of curry down me strides — maybe I'll get to feature — M.O.

EDDIE KENDRICKS: (Tamla Motown). Eddie split from the Temptations just after David Ruffin. It was the end of the classic partnership in that group. Sweet-voiced Eddie; sharp-edged Ruffin. After that Norman Whitfield took over the Tempts completely and swamped the group in orchestration. Very successful he was too in commercial terms. Ruffin and Kendrick became the forgotten men of Motown. Ruffin's still that way; Eddie's rehabilitation has reached a stunning climax with this album (a top ten hit in the States) and with the single culled from it ("Keep On Truckin'" number one in Cashbox). It was pretty obvious that things were heading that way with his last solo album ("People Hold On") "Eddie Kendrick" is merely the natural progression from that solid groundwork. "People" was mostly produced by Frank Wilson, so is this latest album. The fact that he's given just one producer to work with makes it obvious that Motown are getting serious about Eddie nowadays — about time. His yearning floating voice shimmers on top of some of Frank Wilson's best arrangements (he's aided by co-producer Leonard Caston and by James Carmichael) — they even manage to find something new in "Any Day Now," never thought I'd get to like another version after Chuck Jackson's. Despite that and the presence of the hit single I mentioned previously, there's a track which beats them all hollow. It's called "Darling Come Back Home" and is his follow-up single in the States and should certainly be as hot as "Truckin'." "Each Day I Cry A Little" is a beautifully, swaying litting soul ballad. In "Darling" there's what sounds like a steel drum that makes the track a complete success; in "Each Day" it's the clipped choruses from the girl back-up group that give the song a rounded, finished feel. But over the whole album Eddie Kendrick has stamped his winning craftsmanship and given notice that he ain't about to be buried at Motown. — G.B.

JACKSON BROWNE: "For Everyman" (Asylum). He burst on to the scene with great hullabaloo and was possibly fortunate to get his first album out when Asylum was particularly fresh and hot — the Eagles you'll recall were flying high. That debut set I loved — "Jamaica Say You Will," "Song For Adam" and, especially, "Doctor My Eyes" and "Rock Me On The Water" were superb songs. The majority of those songs were the up-tempo part of the album — Jackson's rather mono-toned vocals became depressingly morbid on the slow songs. The same conditions prevail on his second album. Both sides open with a fast 'un. The Eagles' hit "Take It Easy" (co-written by Browne and Glenn Frey) starts side one; the excellent "Red Neck Friend," gets side two rolling with some smart slide guitar from David Lindley (he repeats the dose on "These Days" and his work all through the album is a highlight. He even stars on electric fiddle during "Ready Or Not"). After the opener there's a rather tacky feeling to side one — a reliance on the slow-paced and the maudlin. On side two the pace varies more and the songs counterpoint each other the better for it. After "Red Neck" there's a slow, still rather cloying song and as one sits preparing for the worst Lindley's electric fiddle lifts "Ready" up and away. Jackson takes "Sing My Songs To Me" back down to a minor mood (Joni Mitchell, on electric piano) which segues into the stronger, title track which ends the side. As the two opening tracks on the first side had also been blended into one the effect is of placing quotation marks around the album. Between the quotes Jackson makes no astounding statements; just lays down his melodies and lyrics and leaves philosophising fairly well alone. A solid enough album but not as freshly appealing as his debut. — G.B.

Unhappy trails

QUICKSILVER: "Anthology" (Capitol) / COUNTRY JOE AND THE FISH: "Best Of" (Vanguard). Between them, these bands represent the two sides of San Francisco rock. Quicksilver took the musical trail; the twin lead guitars of John Cipollina and Gary Duncan laid down a style that's still copied today. Country Joe concentrated on the lyrics, following the folk/protest boom of the early sixties, adding his own acid wit and crossing the Establishment's boundaries of decency. Such a pity, then, that the balls are knocked out of the bands by these two compilations. I feel more sympathetic towards Quicksilver's "Anthology," as it gives personnel and recording dates for each cut and has been compiled in chronological order. But the tracks have been selected in a very eccentric manner. There can be little argument that "Happy Trials" was their best album — yet only one track appears from it, "Mona." And there are no tracks from their last album "Comin' Thru." Nevertheless, the first five cuts on "Anthology" are sufficient to prove that Quicksilver could have been the best of the West Coast bands if only they'd stuck together. When Cipollina (now with Copperhead) and Duncan (still, presumably, with Quicksilver) although the band was reported to have broken up last year, just before their first British visit) get charged up on "The Fool" and "Mona" few bands can match them. They had playing off one another down to a fine art as they chased different strands and themes, nobly supported by David Freiberg (now with Jefferson Airplane), mostly on bass and vocals and Greg Elmore (also presumably with Quicksilver), a drummer who never showed off or dominated. A welcome addition to this early period is the amusing "Bears," not previously available on album, which provides a light 'buffer' between the heavies. From '69 onwards the band was racked with personnel changes. Pianist Nicky Hopkins came and went, vocalist Dino Valenti arrived and came up trumps first time around with the classic "Fresh Air." Quicksilver fiddled around for three albums with an unstable line-up, before hitting the melodic "soul" vein of their last two albums. That period is particularly well-represented on "Anthology" and you can tell from "Don't Cry My Lady Love" and "I Found Love" that they were reaching a new peak. It came on "Comin' Thru" — I wonder why we're not allowed to hear it? If Country Joe and the Fish reached a peak, the "Best Of" album successfully hides it by jumbling up the tracks and giving no indication of what was recorded when. The first — and best — album, "Electric Music For The Mind And Body," is particularly poorly represented — no "Superbird" for example. But this alleged "Best Of" is filled with inexplicable omissions and anomalies — "Not So Sweet Martha Lorraine" is in, but "Return Of Sweet Lorraine" out; "Grace," the song for Jefferson Airplane's Grace Slick is included but not "Janis," the song for Janis Joplin. My advice to anyone contemplating purchasing this album is to take note of the massive plug for other Country Joe and the Fish albums that fill up the space on the cover that should have been used for such obvious details as who's in the band. Try "Electric Music..." and "C. J. Fish" for size — they're the real best of Country Joe and the Fish. — M.O.

CLOSING TIME!

Personal opinion by GEOFF BROWN

IT is now six months since Bees Make Honey were featured on page three of the Melody Maker. It was, perhaps, the beginning of the end of Pub Rock as it was originally conceived by its earliest protagonists.

A new generation of bands is gradually infiltrating the gigs played by Brinsley Schwarz, Kilburn And The High Roads, Clancy, Ducks De Luxe, Ace and the like. They, like the Bees, are now spreading their net throughout Britain and making swift inroads into the lucrative college circuit.

When the "first generation" decided that the Kensington, the Lord Nelson et al were becoming passe and students had more to offer than mine host, they began to decry the very tag that they'd cultivated.

They were not, they all said, "pub rock."

To clarify that small but fairly important gripe it should be remembered that it was, in fact, the groups themselves who invented the label to more easily define and more profitably market their music.

It was a conscious, deliberate musicians' strategy. And it worked.

Once its success became evident, venues mushroomed, the number of bands chasing the dates correspondingly increased. Not all of the newer bands were as good as the first batch, who found the musical currency of their scene being increasingly devalued.

They had, however, made their mark effectively enough. Record companies sniffed and scuffled, hesitated, looked again and finally got the contracts out.

Brinsley Schwarz, of course, were already signed to United Artists. They've had some five albums out and are, to my mind, unquestionably the best band of their type.

Bees Make Honey signed with EMI. Their first album is ready; their first single, "Knee Trembler," is in the shops. They've had several personnel changes and still have problems in that direction. The album is good and will cement their reputation.

Ducks De Luxe signed with RCA and their first single appeared at the same time as the Bees' debut. The Ducks' "Coast To Coast" is a simpler and punchier record, and therefore has possibly more chance.

It'll be something of a surprise if either single is a hit. Clancy are at present recording their first single, probably "Steal Away." They too, appear to have personnel uncertainties.

BEES MAKE HONEY: good album

Kilburn And The High Roads are the band that I find the most exciting because of their idiosyncratic music. Half undiluted fun 'n' dance, half insidious menace.

Although at present signed to Charlie Gillett's Oval Records, the Kiburns are soon to sign with a major company.

Their music, appeal and success is black and white. Either they will do everything for you or they will do nothing for you.

That being, in rough terms, the state of the poll this week, it also has to be said that many people are extremely sceptical about the success these bands will have in breaking out of the circuit and reaching the widest audience.

Personally, I think they will succeed in varying degrees by the usual methods. Playing live, working hard, getting to the people. It has been their way from the date of their respective formations.

This continual playing will, inevitably, alter their approach and style of music — homogenise it if you like — to appeal to the greater numbers. It may be a barely perceptible shift, but it is certain to take place.

Doubts have also been raised about the quality of the actual music. The usual opinion is that it is competent, often unexciting, it takes no chances and will, in the end, be of narrow appeal.

In many respects this argument is comparing the present scene to the club scene of London in the mid-sixties — the now infamous soul boom, which I loved incidentally.

If this reasoning proves to be accurate, and it's certainly the spirit extant at their gigs, then it's worth catching these groups now for in them lies the next set of Elton Johns, Rod Stewarts and so forth.

The argument can be faulted, however, by the plain fact that many of the musicians playing in the first batch of pub bands were also around in the mid-sixties.

No chickens, most of these boys.

The "second generation" of pub rock bands have really made the title quite redundant, for it was generally applied only to those who generated "club" atmosphere, played fairly non-aggressively, using material culled from rockabilly, rock 'n' roll, Motown and rhythm and blues.

Apart from one or two exceptions (notably Mick Lowe in Brinsley Schwarz) there have been few consistently good writers in evidence.

Fresh material also seems to be something of a stumbling block for the newest bands moving into the circuit (rock, like nature, abhors a vacuum). They appear to be drawing their material from more contemporary sources. Many have as much in common with groups on the Mecca and Top Rank circuits.

They are young, confident, brash groups. They do not have the overall air of competence; there are usually two musicians in, say, a five-piece who have clear promise, though it is often in its most embryonic state.

Many of these bands use make-up, glitter, the lot. It is quite obvious that they are not as yet leaders of any scene. They regularly and slavishly imitate their idols, interspersing current chart material with brief glances to the past (that being never more than seven years ago).

The atmosphere of the circuit proper — there are many newly grown venues which have missed the Bees, Ducks, etc. — is changing noticeably. The feeling I get nowadays is of a scene that, despite being deliberately developed, is now being even more cynically used by various management concerns.

They book their band into an ale-house, dub them "pub rock" and await profits and enquiries from record companies. A far cry from the rather more idealistic if not wholly philanthropic circumstances of the birth of the booze blues.

Nevertheless, I shall continue to stagger from boozier to boozier in the relentless search for the NEXT BIG THING. I've probably already seen them. It's just that they're all playing in different groups. Once the deck is well and truly shuffled and several more hands have been dealt, the "second batch" on the scene will start to deliver.

In the meantime pub bands Mark I spread their wings and go nationwide. Kilburn And The High Roads, for example, are on tour with The Who — they started off in the pubs too, y'know.

A FEW YEARS ago, George Melly described himself as a child of the Fifties adrift in the Sixties. Well, all things have a tendency of coming back to roost in time, as Melly has in the Seventies, so there's hope yet for Al Stewart.

"I'm without a shadow of a doubt a Sixties person adrift in the Seventies," he said, recalling the Melly aphorism. "My loyalties belong to the Sixties almost entirely, you know."

He sat there reminiscing about the Sixties, not caring one little bit whether the teenage folkies who've nourished their sexual fantasies on "Love Chronicles" will be able to relate to a song like "Old Admirals" which is about the creator of the modern ironclad Royal Navy, or even to the whole spirit of his newest album which is purest Sixties, punk rock to psychedelia.

"That would be the highest compliment you could pay me," he said, "to say this new album's got a Sixties feel. But I don't know whether the teenagers of today will be able to relate to it at all. I haven't a clue."

"Actually, of all the albums I've made and of all the songs that I've written, this is the one that I'm least worried about whether people relate to it or not, because it's from beginning to end something I've told you I was going to do, and I've done it, right? And we move on to the next one, which won't be like it."

"I have no idea whether a 15-year-old could relate to 'Old Admirals'. It seems to me extraordinarily unlikely. But then again, if in 15 records time people ask me to play a record, I may well stick on 'Old Admirals'."

"Every time I go to CBS I hear the same word, which is marketability, right? I hear: 'Are we going to make such-and-such's show with this one?' And: 'We've got a three-minute time spot we can fill', right? This is very Seventies thinking."

"This album has been made without any regard to that, and it's been made almost as if I was back living in Soho, writing songs, six years ago. The Sixties, going through punk rock and into Radio London and the Pirates, exploded the whole thing to such an extent that people's imagination could be given almost free rein."

"The idea that you could range your imagination on to any subject is very Sixties. I mean, like the Seventies are a more compressed thing."

"Which way did the Sixties go?" is a line from one of the new songs, and on "Terminal Eyes," the conscious Sgt. Pepper pastiche which he says he'll never be able to perform on stage, he answers his own question: they committed suicide.

"The song is a suicide of the Walrus. He doesn't appear in the lyric, but the similarity to 'I am the Walrus' is deliberate. I've taken the Walrus, he could've been anybody with long hair at UFO, it could've been anyone with a gold face, or whatever."

"I've symbolised the Walrus as being the symbol of the Woodstock Dream. My long-haired Walrus, who went out and penned these songs."

"Now my feeling is that the Walrus committed suicide, that this music committed suicide by reaching to a point where it cut off its roots with the people. It was done partly through the drug thing which has resulted in the death of so many people, partly through becoming too esoteric and losing the faith of the people, and it was partly by going into a stage where you played with your back to the audience and ignoring them."

"This has resulted in David Bowie and Gary Glitter and a whole new thing, glitter rock, because it became silly."

"This is a serious song if you read the lyric of it and it is the suicide song of the Walrus, hence the tempo and the rhythm and the feel of it."

In fact, they are all serious songs, even the flip surrealism of "Post World War Two Blues" with Churchill saying to Mountbatten, "Oh, every time I look at you, I feel so low, I don't know what to do."

"It's a photo-montage of rock'n'roll stars and politicians of my time and obviously it is autobiographical. It's almost a flip back to the songs that were all about me. This one's about me but it reflects the people who have affected me either consciously or unconsciously."

The songs are also all contemporary, whether they are about a World War I admiral, the massacre by Hitler of a Nazi leader and 2,000 of his Storm Troopers in 1934, or the German drive

AL STEWART: 'My loyalties belong to the Sixties'

Stewart: adrift in the Seventies into Russia in 1941.

The only song which is exactly what it seems to be about is "Roads to Moscow," a monumental Russian novel of a song, which begins with the German invasion and ends with a Russian soldier contemplating his future inside a Stalinist prison camp.

And then there's Nostradamus, the "future" in the "Past, Present and Future" of the album's title, the medieval seer who predicted the rise and fall of Napoleon and Hitler (though he got their names slightly wrong), the deaths of the Kennedys and the election of Pope Paul.

Al Stewart concertgoers will already be familiar with the song, which he has been singing for more than a year now, and if nine-minute singles were a feasible proposition, I'd be suggesting it would be a great single, especially since if you are given to watching stuff like The Michael Parkinson show, you are likely to hear Al singing it on TV soon.

With him will be Miss Erika Cheatham, the young lady who contributes the erudite note on "Nostradamus" to the sleeve of the album, and whose notes for a book on the seer gave Al the tip-off about what's going to happen after the death of Pope Paul, which he confides to the record-buying public in his last verse.

Does he really believe that this Frenchman in the 16th century knew that we were going to join the Common Market and Israel was going to defeat the Arabs?

"My impression is that it's fairly amazing," he said. "I think it's very possible. I mean if Teddy Kennedy stands, there is a good chance he's going to win in '76, which is what Nostradamus says."

"Whether or not it's all going to happen, I don't know. But I'm impressed to the point of being interested. But of course it's in the lap of the Gods."

What's not entirely in the lap of the Gods and what Nostradamus doesn't illuminate us on, is whether this child of the Sixties is going to come to rest before the Seventies are over.

I think he might. Time is speeding up, and already I see signs of a psychedelic revival blowing up in the mists within my crystal ball.

ROCK GIANTS FROM A-Z Melody Maker

THE Everly Brothers — Don and Phil — first emerged in the rock 'n' roll market in 1957, with a unique harmony-vocal sound, a modern country-music aesthetic, and strong teenage material.

Nobody has matched their sound — not then, and not now — though many people tried. Remember the Kalin Twins, the Brook Brothers, the Allison's?

Their impact on the whole development of our music has proved immense. In the fifties, they were next in line only to Presley and Buddy Holly in their importance to the shaping of a white pop sensibility.

In the early sixties, they influenced the changes that came from both sides of the Atlantic: the surfing harmonies that began the West Coast sound with the Beach Boys and Jan and Dean in the USA, and the innovative vocal patterns of The Beatles in Britain.

By the late sixties, it was clear that the Everlys were truly important influences of the "new" country music of the Byrds, Burritos and even Dylan.

So it is no exaggeration to say that their impact has straddled three generations of the music this series focuses on. Born in Brownie, Kentucky, a dying mining village, in 1937 and 1939, Don and Phil Everly were raised on country music and the hymns of a harsh Protestantism. By the time they were eight and six years old, they were singing on local radio shows in places like Shenandoah, Iowa, on the family breakfast show their parents had launched.

The show aimed at home-loving country-music audiences, and along with all the travelling that live appearances involved, it kept the brothers busy all the way through to Phil's graduation from high-school. Then they went solo.

They based themselves in Nashville, were "discovered" by music-publishing mogul Wesley Rose, and contracted to Archie Bleyer's short-lived Cadence label. Chet Atkins, who survived Elvis's early RCA sessions, also worked on the sessions for Don and Phil, encouraging them to use their own arrangements to light up the reliable, commercial songs provided by Boudleaux and Felice Bryant.

The result was a formula that couldn't miss: close-harmony vocals drawn largely from country conventions, warm and gutsy acoustic-guitar back-ups, and lyrics that catalogued the problems of middle-class white teenage life.

While others found a sound by accident, the Everlys developed one deliberately and intelligently, and bridged what gap there was between modern country music and pop.

Their voices, Don's deeper, Phil's sweeter, made a magic and imaginative alliance, soulfully seductive and yet with a liquid flexibility equally capable of thin, fragile tension and of an orchestral swell; their arrangements were simple but never less than resourceful, and they had taste. They were very commercial and they were very good.

They struck gold with their first single, "Bye Bye Love," and again with their next, "Wake Up Little Susie," which topped the US charts in late '57. By that time the Everlys had toured in their own right and the combination of their music and their image had made them stars.

Visually they matched that music, starting off looking like awkward Mid-West kids who dressed far from sharply, but shifting over quickly to cuffed greasy hair and tailored clothes — all reflecting their musical alliance between pop and Nashville, Tennessee. Alongside that, the suggestion of dissipation and world-weariness (understandably) in their faces — the shadow of the hoodlum passing across the boys next door — gave them a distinctive and sexy fascination.

In fact, "Wake Up Little Susie" combined all this: on one level it dealt with dating and going to the movies and getting innocently landed in a mess — standard pop lyrics with added country corn — but on another level it raised the spectre of real sexual scandal as a result of Don, Phil and Susie not coming home till dawn. From then on, the Everlys were rarely out of the best-seller lists right through to 1963, as single after single became hit after world-wide hit. Till 1960 they stuck with the small Cadence company (put out on the London label in Britain) and scored with "All I Have To Do Is Dream," "Bird Dog," "Poor Jenny," "Problems," "Take A Message to Mary," "Let It Be Me" and more besides.

Then they moved to the newly set-up Warner Brothers label, launching their list with "Cathy's Clown" (catalogue number WB 1) and launching a new round of success at the same time.

And what a launch. "Cathy's Clown" sold a million in Britain alone, staying a phenomenal nine weeks at the top of the charts. In America it also topped, and also sold gold. Cadence rushed in with a "follow-up," "When Will I Be Loved," and the fans made it a hit. Then came "So Sad" and a rockin' "Lucille" (Warners) and then "Like Strangers" (another Cadence issue from the archives). After that, Cadence ran out of material to issue: it wasn't long before they folded.

The Everlys, still friends with the winning Bryant song-writing team (and still writing hits for themselves, too), sailed on, keeping up the best-sellers with "Temptation," "Muskrat," and the double-sided smash "Walk Right Back" / "Ebony Eyes."

Meanwhile on albums, they were putting down not merely strong commercial material, but genuinely impressive stuff — try listening, even now, to either "Nashville Blues" (1960) or their "Trouble In Mind" (62).

One of the main reasons such material was so impressive, was that Don and Phil had never lost their country roots. They didn't, like so many others, have to find them in the late '60s — they'd never discarded them in the first place. Even when pop had, by 1962, become as superficially slick as bubblegum and hick, the Everlys would use material from precisely that genre.

On the pop-packaged "Instant Party" album, for instance, they included "Ground Hawg" and "Long Lost John."

Yet things were beginning to deteriorate for them. That same year (1962), they arrived in Britain for yet another tour, and Don Everly cracked up before the tour got underway. He was rushed into hospital with what a spokesman for the brothers described as "nervous exhaustion."

Phil struggled through the tour alone, in obvious difficulty. His bewilderment and emotionalism seemed genuine enough, especially when, struggling for words, he dedicated "No-One Can Make My Sunshine Smile" to his brother. Yes, country corn again, but moving at the time, not least to Phil himself.

What was disorientating too, was that throughout that tour, the famous harmonies were managed by Phil singing Don's part in every song, while his look-alike lead-guitarist Jerry Page, took on Phil's role as best he could. It seemed to symbolise the new precariousness of the Everly Brothers' career.

Other troubles developed around the same time. Rows between the two of them, both before and after Don's break-down, had become too frequent to conceal — at a time, it must be remembered, when fan-mythology required from every glamorous star that he glitter not only in public but also through the pristine idyll of his unblemished private life.

Moreover, Don Everly's second wife, Venetta Stevenson, stirred up another rash of muck-raking when she claimed to have been kicked in the stomach in a fight with her teen-idol husband. (In response, an off-shoot of the US fan-club formed a Society For The Prevention Of Cruelty To The Everly Brothers. It was clearly a rather desperate defensive stand.)

More significantly, perhaps, the Everlys had broken off all relations with Boudleaux Bryant, and moved over to the Goffin-King school of song-writing, just as that formula was coming to the end of its hit-parade dominance.

They had a few more hits, but the Beatles were arriving and clearly the world had changed when those Liverpool upstarts ousted Don and Phil from their long-held top slot in the Best Vocal Group category of the polls.

The hits tailed away, and though the Everlys carried on, they lost direction. Their records grew less and less distinctively Everlyish, as they lurched from phase to craze and back again. Sometimes they sounded uncharacteristically tough, as on "The Price Of Love" and "Man With Money" — which is, in retrospect, a classic single, sounding like nothing so much as a Pete Townshend composition, with its heightened dramatic effects, its crashing, frenetic chords and its glowering violence.

Sometimes, in contrast, they sounded lost and effete, trying to squeeze a hit out of nostalgia — as with "Love Is Strange" — at precisely the time when oldies were furthest from being rated as goldies. At other times, they put out singles as sensitive and experimental as their totally ignored "Empty Boxes."

And yet they were equally capable of clutching at even the protest craze, as with Don's own uneasy song "Human Race" (The B-side of that was another protest number, and written by the early exploiter of yet another passing fad — flower power — Scott McKenzie.)

It seemed as if the Everly Brothers were forgotten heroes: even as if they had themselves forgotten what had made them great. Yet in fact, if they were indeed forgotten, it wasn't because they had nothing to offer in the closing years of the decade but because everyone took their contribution to the new music too much for granted.

Though their own records were no longer commercial successes and their own fortunes had plunged a lot, the Everlys were alive and well in their influence on the new successes around them.

They had contributed an important ingredient to the Beatles' imaginative early recipes; they had profoundly influenced the harmonies which had weaved their way through all those classic surfing sounds; and they had kept the strengths of Nashville assertively obvious. The soft rock of Roger McGuinn's 12-string guitar work became, as the Byrds orientated themselves more and more towards country music, a direct and recognisable descendant of those full-chord acoustic arrangements the Everlys had pioneered before.

Eventually, recognition began to come. It became plain that Don and Phil's harmonies were the inspiration for that other duo, Simon and Garfunkel — and were the indispensable precursor of work of theirs that seemed progressive and fresh in 1968, like the excellent "Mrs Robinson." It was no surprise that Simon and Garfunkel should include a straightforwardly derivative tribute-version of "Bye Bye Love" on one of their albums.

They were not alone in making such a tribute. On "Self Portrait" in 1970, Bob Dylan included not one but two of the Everlys' old hits: "Take A Message To Mary" and "Let It Be Me."

by Michael Gray

And Dylan did something else, too, that showed the regard in which he held their significance to rock's history — and the incredible time gulf that the Everlys straddled. For just as, way back in the '50s, Buddy Holly had written a song for Don and Phil in appreciation of their abilities (the song was "Not Fade Away"), so Dylan, as the 1970s dawned, wrote a song for them to express his own appreciation for the strengths their music had maintained all through from that earlier bygone age.

Dylan saw the Everlys live, was "knocked out" by the vitality and authenticity of their country-music roots, and wrote them a song called "The Fugitive." (In the event, the Everly Brothers released neither a version of "Not Fade Away" nor of "The Fugitive," but it is, as they say, the thought that counts.)

Don spent 1970 going through "a lot of personal trips" and did a lot of reassessing. The following year, the results of all that came through on record, and proved something that even their staunchest fans would have thought unlikely: namely, that even as contemporary recording artists themselves, the Everly Brothers not only still existed, but could make a major contribution.

First, and less of an achievement, Don Everly came out with a solo album, produced by the revered Lou Adler. What it attempted was nothing less than a merger between acid-trip and post-acid consciousness on the one hand, and the Everlys' own brand of country-pop on the other. It wasn't entirely successful, but some tracks were fascinating. "Omaha," for instance, has the take-me-back-home country theme, which runs all through the Everlys records as from 1960, and had, by the end of that decade, formed the basis for the whole get-back-to-roots movement. Yet it also has a recurrent spacey vocal chorus-plus-slack-drums sound that owes as much to "Sgt Pepper" as that album's "Lucy In The Sky With Diamonds" owed to the Everlys' 1961 hit "Temptation."

If that was some kind of full circle, then the other album from the Everly Brothers in 1971 was even more of one. It was called "Roots." In part it was a retrospective glance at Don and Phil themselves. It not only included interspersed excerpts from an Everly Family radio show recorded in their Brownie Kentucky home-town in 1952 (when Phil was 13, Don 15 years old), it also featured a mature re-working of one of their very earliest B-sides, "I Wonder If I Care As Much."

Yet the album was far from a nostalgia-squeezing throw-back. It was a major contribution to that movement which, in the hands of artists of taste and thoughtfulness, was re-alerting the hip fraternity to the strengths of long-spurned "redneck" country music.

It was not only the best work the Everly Brothers had ever done, it was also worthy of comparison with that masterpiece of the new "old" genre, The Band. There was not much difference in subject-matter, treatment or conscientiousness between the two.

"Roots" was a supremely confident and sustained achievement, and it was quite rightly recognised as one of the best albums of its year. No-one else who had first emerged successfully into the rock 'n' roll scene of 1957 could match a coup like that.

So the brothers were back, and it seemed as if all the options were open to them. It seemed as if the whole range of the music of the previous fifteen years was at their disposal. "Roots" was booming out of ex-hippies' stereo-sets: the old hit singles were lauded as true classics; artists like John Sebastian and David Crosby, who were conscious of the impact of the Everlys on what they had themselves created over the years, wanted to record with Don and Phil.

Meanwhile, the Everly Brothers were back on the road, touring again. Going the tiring rounds of clubs all over the USA and Europe, singing their oldies by request and patiently content to slip newer (and much older) material here and there. Now they've split, in acrimony, in the middle of just such a series of gigs in America. They've been on the road, with their parents and each other, for a staggering twenty-eight years.

At present, it looks as if they just can't stand it any more.

Friends of Don and Phil say they're sure that this phenomenal Everly Brothers career can't really finish in the abrupt disarray of the recent split-up. Yet even if it can and has, their place in the history of our music is inviolable.

And like all significant history, its ramifications extend beyond it into the present and the future.

● Their impact on the development of our music has proved immense ●

MADDY PRIOR:

There don't seem to be any male groupies

MARION FUDGER:

Women haven't been given the chance to prove themselves

ELKIE BROOKS:

I didn't have any confidence in myself

■ JUST what is the major role of women in rock music? In an age when traditional social attitudes are constantly under challenge, how effectively has the issue of women's rights infiltrated the music business? The MM posed this question to four female artists, Yvonne Elliman from Jesus Christ Superstar, Elkie Brooks of Vinegar Joe, Maddy Prior from Steeleye Span and Marsha Hunt, who today is also a deejay for London's Capital Radio.

■ And talking about the subject from different viewpoints were rock writer Marion Fudger from the woman's magazine, Spare Rib and Susie Watson-Taylor, manager of the incredible String Band.

■ The MM believes the ensuing discussion pinpoints the difficulties facing women in the rock business — and gives hope that times are, indeed, changing. ROBERT PARTRIDGE conducted the dialogue. Pictures by BARRIE WENTZELL.

MM: Can we first talk about the status of women in rock — it's been said, for instance, that the only constructive female role in the history of the music has been that of fan.

Marion: And why do you suppose that is? It's because there's been mostly men on stage. And there are mostly men writing about the men on stage, and there are mostly men filming the men on stage and so it goes on . . .

Maddy: Who do you think has engineered that situation? The audience? The band, the media?

MM: All I'm saying is that the basic role of women seems to be as fans.

Yvonne: Why do you say that? Do you think that women are not as good as men? Or is it just that they haven't been given a chance.

Marion: That's it. They haven't been given the chance to prove themselves as anything other than fans. But now I think they're getting more of a chance and there's a noticeable change with more women coming through. They need the years of experience men have had.

MM SPECIAL ON WOMEN IN ROCK

They need the confidence as well.

Elkie: Yes, you're knocked all the time anyway. I know for myself the reason it took me such a long time to get myself involved with a band was confidence. I didn't have any confidence in myself.

Yvonne: Some male musicians don't take female singers seriously because they don't think their voices are much good . . .

Elkie: I'll give you an example. I did a tribute gig for Tubby Hayes about four weeks ago and I got a vibe from the musicians before I'd even sung a note — "oh, we all know about you" kind of thing.

But as soon as I opened my mouth to sing they changed completely, they were completely different towards me.

Maddy: So you had to prove yourself first?

Elkie: Yes. Maddy: But don't you think that's the same with any singer?

Elkie: No, I don't think so really . . .

MM: But you say you once lacked confidence. Why?

Elkie: I think there was a time, y'know, when I felt very paranoid. I felt everyone was having a go at me, I just couldn't give anything of myself.

MM: Was that specifically because you were female?

Marion: . . . I think that's a specifically female problem. Not just with Elkie, it's probably the way we all feel. And besides, in rock there have been two female alternatives, both of which are pretty stinking.

One is the passive female stereotype where you — and I'm not knocking any female who sings this way because they've managed to get there, which is something — stay very still and you play a guitar and you sing very sweetly.

That is one role. The other role is apeing the male stereotype, which is Suzie Quatro, right?

Elkie: If you go back six or seven years there were so many female singers around, but they were all solo artists

Marion: But they were just product.

Maddy: I'm not sure they thought of themselves as just product.

Marion: No, I'm sure they didn't. They were doing something they enjoyed very much, they took their opportunities. So I'm not knocking them at all.

I'm saying that out of those two alternatives neither of them appeals very much. So you have to try and break out of the traditional singer roles — like Joplin.

She was just herself! and her act was herself. It wasn't male and it wasn't the traditional female role, it was pure artistic talent.

Maddy: Very largely that's a personal problem that affects both sexes. Putting their own thing over is just a common problem.

MM: But looking back to the Fifties and the early-Sixties, it seems that all the big stars were male. Why?

Elkie: That's down to your music papers.

MM: Do you think critics have been down on women artists?

Marion: I don't think you've given them the space they deserve . . .

Elkie: There are a lot of good female singers around, but they're just not publicised.

MM: Isn't there an element of paranoia in what you're claiming?

Elkie: What? I'd like to say there's more paranoia among the male members of my band than there is in me.

MM: Another problem, presumably, is getting your music treated seriously. Marsha, for instance, wouldn't you say that the way you looked was more important — to much of the media anyway — than your music?

Marsha: Oh definitely. I mean, if somebody tried to attribute my notoriety to my accomplishments, well, there are no accomplishments.

I was in the chorus of a show which was very successful and I was there for only six months of the five years it ran. I've had four records released, none of which have been successful.

I didn't do anything in Hair, period. I mean, I was literally chorus. I didn't have a solo spot in the show . . .

Elkie: I always thought you did, I mean, after the way you were publicised . . .

Marsha: Right! But that's the journalism trip. They came down to take pictures after a preview show and there were a lot of kids who were all dressed alike, but I happened to have more hair than anybody else on stage so all the photographers went for me.

And it wasn't being clever, it was just that I had more hair.

Remember, at the time I was coming along, especially as far as England was concerned, there was a lot going down in America with black naturalism.

And I was one of the few people here who pictorially they were able to exploit with the hair. They thought I looked like what black America was all about.

And then I was signed to a record label as basically a publicity hype, which I was. I mean, I knew f— all about music, I can hardly pitch.

But I was willing to go along with it all and I put a record out. And when I went to promote the record on Top Of The Pops my attire, so to speak, caused a lot of hurrahs.

I was showing cleavage, but instead of it being top cleavage, it was bottom cleavage.

And suddenly every gig I did after that it was like "what are you doing here in jeans. We expected you to be wearing the suit you had for Top Of The Pops."

Marion: What did you have in mind when you wore that suit?

Marsha: I liked it. And c'mon, we're in the pop business and pop is a very immediate business.

The gig is either they recognise you and identify with you or they don't. But basically I'm hype. If you try and say it was music, well, what music?

There was the Isle Of Wight Festival, for instance. I was wearing short-shorts, some black boots, gloves and some jewelry — trying to send up the camp scene.

But they took it seriously. And the reason they — the press that is — took it seriously was because there weren't too many other female artists on the bill.

The others were sitting on stools so it was much easier for the photographers to get a sensational picture of my crotch.

What mattered to them was that they had to make some statement about the Festival and so my picture was splattered all over the front pages the next day.

But you either get into the business knowing that's going to happen or you naively

SUSIE

If someone has ability, it doesn't matter what sex they are

MARSHA HUNT:

The pop business has always exploited sexuality

ELLIMAN:

Some male musicians don't take female singers seriously confront the business thinking that you are not going to be exploited on that level.

Or you can go in determined not to be exploited at all.

Maddy: — and then you don't make it.

Marsha: You don't make it, right. One reason I did what I did was because I was tired of English roses, I mean, the sweethearts who sing in front of the microphone and it's all civilised MM: Do you think people have been forced into that role?

Marsha: I don't know. For example Mary Hopkin is a really lovely lady who has something to say and who has definite feelings about a whole number of things. But the way she was exploited in the press and the business was as England's sweetheart, or even the Beatles' sweetheart.

Marion: Yeah, it was sick

Marsha: ... the sickening thing wasn't Mary — she's not a sickening person — but Elkie: But that's not just a problem for women. You can say the same thing about men. If you're going to let yourself be exploited, if you say OK I really want to be a success so Maddy: I agree. It's the same for men, surely.

Marsha: You don't make it, right.

Marion: But don't you think that's an incredibly negative attitude. Just to say "right, I'm going to be exploited because I'm female" is negative. You say OK accept it or don't go in. Why?

Marsha: That's not right. I said there were three ways of going into the business...

Marion: Yeah, but we can discount two of them.

Marsha: No, not necessarily.

Elkie: If you're talking about having to put yourself over on stage, well, I wear quite sexy outfits and the only time I've been noticed in the business has been since I started putting myself over wearing nice things.

OK I can sing, but like you say, it's irrelevant sometimes whether you can sing.

MM: But surely David Bowie and Mick Jagger got exactly the same kind of national press coverage as Marsha, purely because they look good?

Maddy: Sure, if you open a paper and see a picture of an attractive person, you're obviously going to look at it. That's a fact of life.

Marsha: Now wait a minute! We're talking about the pop business. And the one thing the pop business has always exploited has been sexuality. And that means visually too.

And women in pop are in much the same situation as blacks have been. You've got to slip in through the side door and once you're in, then do your damage.

But you're kidding yourself if you think you're going to walk in through the front door on your own terms because the world's been going too long on somebody else's terms.

So if they're going to exploit you as a woman, they're going to exploit you... Elkie: Yeah, I've been singing ever since I can remember but until I started putting myself across sexually, putting myself across wearing slits up the sides of my skirts and little bikini tops, nobody wanted to know.

Marion: How do you feel about that?

Elkie: In some ways quite bad. But it's a fact that you've got to put on a show, it's expected today.

Marsha: Now listen, how long have male singers been wearing tight, tight pants?

Elkie: Oh ages and ages.

Marsha: Right! So if women say they're not going to approach from that basic, sexually exploited level I say it, you've got to go through the side door. You gotta get in there first! Because you can sit there on the side lines reaching no audience and making no money forever and a day trying to do it the "right" way.

But the real way to do it is first get in there, and then make your statement.

MM: Do you think women artists have any special appeal?

Marsha: I don't know, I think maybe that women came to see me because it was like a breath of fresh air I was doing something apart from standing there singing.

I was asserting something. I mean, I wasn't carrying any flags across the stage, but I was getting up there and doing what I wanted to do.

Marion: So it had a liberating effect on the female audience, yes?

Marsha: Ahh, well, one of the things which always seemed to turn audiences on, for instance, was when I did a peculiar gig in Scotland once and threatened to punch f out of someone who came up on stage.

And the kids just went mad. I think they were excited by the idea of a chick standing in front of a guy threatening to punch his head in.

MM: Yeah, OK. But this kind of aggressive female role is comparatively new in rock. More traditionally they've played a coy, perhaps passive role, like the Motown singers, yes?

Marsha: I don't know. That kind of image had been there for a long time before and Motown were only just reviving something which had been lost, the importance of female vocalists.

And besides, the image was only play-acting.

Tamla was the first company which attempted to commercialise black music for white audiences and in doing that musically, it had to substantiate that visually by having people who were play acting.

When I dug Diana Ross, however, she was a chick on the streets as far as I was concerned.

And no matter how much she stood on stage in her sweet dresses and her wigs, she was still a chick on the streets to me. I mean, she came from Detroit, and that's a hard town.

So one assumes that, under the facade, there's something a lot tougher lying dormant.

But when I came along I don't think there were any other chicks doing what I was doing. Ahh, well, I'll tell you who's a tough cookie, and who's been a tough cookie all down the line, and that's Tina Turner.

Marion: But she's still dominated by Ike, isn't she? He still says what she should wear, and what the backing band should wear.

Marsha: Sure, we know that, but does the audience?

MM: How important to all of you is a band like Fanny?

Marion: Not important.

Maddy: Not important! In what way?

Marion: The idea of forming an all-girl group is amazing, but I also think that what they've produced has been so disappointing that people say, there you are, all-girl group can't do it.

Maddy: But you were hoping for too much. You wanted to prove a point and that's just not fair. They're a good band and they gave out on stage an image which wasn't too butch, but simply of four people playing music.

I think they were important because they were the first all-girl band, and they did it without being strongly aggressive — and neither were they overly feminine.

Marsha: But does anybody here think that females control the pop business?

Yvonne: Sure.

Marion: You're joking!

Marsha: Of course we control it! Give yourself a little bit of credit.

Marion: What do you mean, "control"? Listen, I phoned up every single record company today, to find out whether they had any female artists on tour and they all said they had nothing at all and anyway, women don't sell records.

Marsha: Hang on, hang on! I think we control the music industry. First of all I think women control the world, period. Secondly I think they control the music industry. Look who's on top in the business — the Osmonds, the Gary Glitters.

Marion: Female audiences you're talking about.

Marsha: Right! The industry has to create artists who satisfy the women who buy the records who make the stars. So we're controlling the s —

Yvonne: We're controlling the market, that's for sure.

Marsha: And pop is a business. If we control the market then we control the business. And if we, as women performers, are too stupid to get out there and see if we can attract the other half of the population, the male half, then Maddy: But if we're exploited so much, why aren't we attracting the male audience?

Marsha: Look, it's simple. Take me, for example. I don't want to go out on the road. And I think women treat themselves too preciously, more preciously than male artists.

I don't think too many women would subject themselves to the kind of hardships men regularly subject themselves to on the road. We don't want those kind of pressures just to attain success.

Yvonne: I think women feel themselves to be too fragile.

Marsha: And pop is a business. If we control the market then we control the business.

MM: But how many female managers are there?

Susie: I know of three. And that's on hearsay, I've never met any of them.

MM: Why aren't there more?

Susie: I don't know, I can't tell you quite honestly.

MM: So how did you become a manager?

Susie: Well, I worked with Joe Boyd for a year and I was the band's personal manager.

And then Joe quit and I was just the only person left.

I didn't have any considerations that because I was a woman I maybe couldn't do the job, only that perhaps I didn't have enough experience.

That's how I did it, I kind of fell into the job.

If someone has ability in this particular area we're talking about, music, it doesn't honestly matter what sex they are.

And I think more women ought to wake up to the fact that they have inherent abilities that perhaps they've been conditioned into thinking they haven't got.

Marsha: Who manages John Lennon? Yoko does. Who manages Keith Richard? Probably Anita Pallenberg. Mick Jagger? Probably Bianca. Who manages Marc Bolan?

June.

So maybe where we're stupid is in not picking up our 20 per cent.

Where women continually lose out is when they allow their emotions to take over.

I think it's crazy we don't organise ourselves a little better.

I doubt very seriously whether June Bolan picks up her 20 per cent, but she should f — well have it.

MM: That still doesn't answer the question why there aren't more actual female managers? Susie: It's a lot to do with upbringing and the fact society up until this century has been amazing tight on chicks — until the suffragette movement came along, I suppose.

Marsha: But how many young managers, male or female are there? People usually establish themselves as managers during their late-20s and early-30s and many women, during that time in their lives, have committed themselves to families.

And a manager cannot have the responsibility of a baby waking up at 4 in the morning wanting you while you're in Timbuctoo with some group or other.

Maternity always comes up pretty strongly. Either you reject your kids or you reject the idea of becoming a mother.

I remember, for example, that when I became pregnant I had to go to my managers and to my band and say to them, "I'm getting ready to have a kid which means I'm not going to be able to work."

"That means you're going to be out of a gig as well." It's not such a nice thing. It was a great thing for me, but it wasn't for the people who were depending on me.

MM: But there are whole areas of the music business which haven't been infiltrated by women?

Susie: I think there's not enough general agreement that chicks can do the job. When you have something which is generally agreed upon, then that something usually happens.

To use a mundane example, it's generally agreed most people should go to work at 9.30 in the morning, so as a consequence most people do.

If there was a tremendous amount of agreement on this planet right now that women can do a good job, then women would be out doing those jobs.

MM: But do you think the music business is any more sexist than other areas of society?

Susie: I don't think so. You find vast areas of chauvinism in any area of society.

Marsha: Could anybody tell me whether groupies are any indication of chauvinism?

Marion: Groupies are women who've caught the bug of show business and the only way they can be part of it is by using their sexuality. And if that's the only way, then they're going to use it. But it breeds competition between chicks which is something we're trying to break down. MM: So we get back to my first question. Are the only real roles for women in rock those of fan — and groupie? Maddy: Well, there don't seem to be any male groupies, probably because men tend to be more shy, more reticent.

Marsha: I think young kids tend to be intimidated by female success. A groupie is someone who frequents groups, not necessarily because they respect their art but because they idolise that particular person.

I mean, the Plaster Casters aren't, ah, down there because so-and-so has a good record. And if you're talking about groupies who are kids on the streets you tell me which guys have balled like six chicks in the business.

I'm talking about hard-core groupies, not fans.

And I'll tell you why there are so few. It's because we make ourselves less available.

Women are still in a position where they feel sexually exploited and female artists less readily put themselves in that position than a man who feels more like the aggressor.

Elkie: Now look. It all depends on how female artists behave. The only reason to me why groupies have become so popular is because groups dig to f — 'em.

Now if all the female performers right now dug f — guys who came round after gigs then you'd have male groupies.

Marsha: I think the whole groupie subject should be treated less lightly because it revolves around one's orientation towards sex and promiscuity.

And the female orientation is on a totally different level to men.

MM: To go back to the main point under discussion, do you feel any of the major changes in rock music have been created by women?

Marsha: Didn't the Supremes do anything? Martha and the Vandellas? Basically Motown was founded on female success. And during the Fifties, even, there was a much more equal balance between male and female artists.

But then the group thing came in, and it was not only groups singing, but also groups playing instruments.

The chicks, however, who hadn't been sitting behind drum kits lost out — that's when the push-back came, when the pop industry became a group orientated business.

Marion: ... because they'd been into the vocal aspect of pop and then suddenly ...

Dialogue

Marsha: Right. Groups then became the most important.

Marion: And because women weren't experienced as musicians, wham, where did they go?

Yvonne: That's the problem. There are virtually no women musicians around.

Marsha: Anyway, that's when the change came. And Motown revived the importance of the woman vocalist.

Marion: But why do they go on singing stuff like "My Guy" — "there's nothing in this world I wouldn't do for my guy"? All that junk.

Marsha: Now listen. Is there nothing you wouldn't do for your guy? I mean, they're just singing about love.

Marion: Yeah, but I'd consciously try to avoid singing it, because there's been too much of it.

Marsha: As far as chicks who are doing something heavy are concerned, to my mind the first girl who really came out with some balls was Nina Simone. She was a woman who was asserting herself.

MM: Sure, but are you saying talent always wins through?

Marsha: It's talent plus endurance. And it tends to be that while one is persevering you are also in your 20s getting pregnant. And that makes things difficult.

I mean, I'm not taking my baby on the road with me for seven nights a week.

Marion: It's amazing you know, but I've been doing a series of interviews with women in the industry and I've always asked them, stock question, why there aren't more of them in the business.

And they've always said that once there are children there are too many responsibilities and they can't take their kids to work with them, y'know, they revert back and lose everything they once had. It's such a stock answer.

Marsha: It's not a stock answer.

Marion: But there must be a way round it.

Marsha: What is the way? Nannies?

Marion: No, but there must be a way of improving the situation because at the moment there seem to be 105 men to every woman in the business.

Marsha: You have to decide whether you're going to be an artist — or manager — or you come to the point where you say, OK, I can't be out there seven nights a week because of the baby.

MM: But female artists are still going to be discovered by male A and R directors, the promotion team, by and large, is going to be male and so on right up to the managing director. So we're left with my original statement that women's role, more is less, is as fans — with a few exceptions.

Maddy: I think there are more female artists than you actually give credit for.

Yvonne: If a woman's talented, she's going to make it.

MM: But how possible is it, for instance, for women to become A and R directors?

Marion: Impossible. I'm sorry, but I've talked to a lot of women in the music business and they all consider that kind of move impossible.

But from the point of view of my optimism, I consider it possible. But as soon as a woman enters the record business virtually everyone in authority is a man.

So she's in a corner with only one thing she can use — her sexuality.

And a lot of them, in that corner, will use that and I don't blame them a bit. All I'm saying is, we could change all that.

Marsha: But don't you think, Marion, that women are stupid because they don't use their sexuality — they allow themselves to be used?

Marion: But do female artists get the same money as male artists of comparable status?

Yvonne: Well, speaking for myself, I got paid more than anyone else working on the set of Jesus Christ Superstar

Marion: So there's no financial discrimination?

Marsha: No, I should think we got more money, mainly because there are fewer of us.

Susie: An agent gets the best price he can for a band. After that it's the individual manager's responsibility to split it up between the group's members. So there's no real financial discrimination.

MM: So is there real resistance to women in rock. Or is it even just a question of women's own attitudes — thinking they can't make it?

Marsha: I'm sorry, but I don't think you can reduce it to just women in the music business. I think it keeps coming back to women in society.

Maddy: But women can do as well as they want, the basic thing is making them want to do it.

Susie: People have to be encouraged. If any woman wants to do something, it's a matter of encouragement.

Maddy: They have to re-evaluate themselves and their abilities.

Marsha: Yes, but in re-evaluating themselves I think women should consider that they're much too emotional and we have to divorce ourselves from that.

We have to become more calculating because business is much more calculating.

Maddy: But that's just playing men's roles. Why should women become less emotional?

Marsha: If you're going to play at business, then play it at a business level.

Maddy: But that just means playing by men's rules.

Marsha: Now look, you're trying to change the world all at once. You have either got to — as a woman — approach the business world as it stands.

And pop is a business — we're all involved in it. You're not going to change it all at once.

Maddy: But if you change your approach you're never going to change back.

Marsha: You're not going to change men's attitudes to women all at once. You're going to have to do it one step at a time and the first step is to get in there and fight.

Maddy: But by the time you've made it — your way — you've forgotten why you wanted to get there in the first place.

Susie: It's hard for women to succeed today because we're still at a pioneering stage.

Although the suffragettes pioneered women's rights it was at a level below what we're talking about today.

And what you always find in a pioneer atmosphere is a whole lot of toughness.

MM: Do you think, therefore, that to be a successful woman today you've got to be extra good at your job?

Susie: At the moment, yes. And that's a great challenge.

ENO'S

"I'll make a prediction here," said Brian Eno, stretched out on a sofa and looking as wan and wasted as a consumptive 19th century poet.

"I think, in fact, I shall be seen as a rock revivalist in a funny way because the thing that people miss when they do their rock revival rubbish is the fact that early rock music was, in a lot of cases, the product of incompetence, not competence."

And if there's one thing that Eno is, it's an incompetent musician. That's what he thinks anyway. "There's a misconception," he continued, "that these people were brilliant musicians and they weren't. They were brilliant musicians in the spiritual sense. They had terrific ideas and a lot of ball or whatever. They knew what the physical function of music was, but they weren't virtuosos."

Just like Eno, see? The reaction he's predicted should follow the release on January 11 of this solo album. He's finished it. He played me the tapes. It's great stuff, marvellous fun.

There's a track with out of tune piano, there's a track that's just two notes, there's a track with a frantic Fripp scrubbing a violent solo, there's a track with great and witty lyrics, which sounds as though it just might be a dig at Ferry. Lovely titles too — "Blank Flank," "Dead Finks Don't Talk," "Driving Me Backwards."

Brian Eno is a complete contradiction. His glamorous stage appearance presupposed a cultured speech, a distant coolness. In private his accent is softened cockney, his manner is open and friendly.

The surroundings in this

Ladbroke Grove living room match the image perfectly. Faded elegance. A fox fur hanging over a cane room divider, a broken rocking horse in one corner, shelves of books, records and tapes in another.

Since leaving Roxy, Eno's been working prolifically. He's recorded an album with Bob Fripp, he's recorded his own solo album, he's recorded material for future solo albums and he's heavily involved in the formation of an avant garde music label.

All this and he's bringing fun back into rock too. It has made him ill. He can't swallow yet, he's often very, very hungry. The night before he's bought a three-course meal and, he says, had just about managed to eat the sup. His weight is down to 8st 1lb and, dressed in black shirt and trousers, he looks like a pencil.

But though he's not physically fit his eyes have a bright sparkle. They laugh.

Brian Eno left Roxy Music because he got bored.

"First of all let me say that I think Roxy is a great band and I think their new album is terrific."

Right.
"But what it lacks for me is one of the most important elements of my musical life, which is insanity. I'm interested in things being absurd and there was something really exciting in Roxy at one time. We were juxtaposing things that didn't naturally sit together."

Brian liked the awkwardness of the early band — "things were just being collaged together."

"The element of clumsiness and grotesqueness that arose from that early thing ceased to be there."

Everyone in Roxy had completely different talents and interests and "there was a terrific tension at one stage in the music, which I really enjoyed."

You'd get one person playing simple rhythms (himself, for instance, stabbing chords on piano, playing simply through sheer necessity) and another would play complex patterns over the top.

There's a lot of that contrast in ability on his solo album because he used musicians from totally different areas on the sessions. There was, for instance, Fripp and John Wetton on bass and Simon King on drums "and me on piano and I can't play piano to save my life."

"I think it's successful because the piano and drums are so restricted in what they do that it gives those other instruments a terrific amount of freedom."

There's an impression that Eno is trying to recreate the early spirit of Roxy Music and take it in a direction that he would've preferred. There is, however, no great evidence of any personal friction between Eno and Fripp.

"The problem in the last year of being in Roxy was that I didn't feel that there was any time to experiment."

Eno would get an idea he'd want to try, but he'd need time to set it up, say an hour.

"Since we were all paying equally for the studio time it's quite expensive ... it works out at about £10 each for me to do an experiment and it's in the nature of an experiment that it might fail."

He laughs. The fallacy of rock music, says Eno, is that experimental music is successful. That, he says, is obviously not true. It wouldn't be an experiment if there wasn't that chance of failure. He's spent a whole day in studio and he never for a sound. That's experimenting.

The worst thing about feeling that constraint of time is you feel you must make safe experiments, so you don't actually move very far because you do things that you know have a very good chance of succeeding."

Eno first got into music through poetry. He used to sing along to records a lot, of course, and by the time he was ten could do a very fair Buddy Holly imitation. He never thought he'd be in a group though. He couldn't play an instrument, which doesn't really help, and he had no inclination to learn, which also doesn't help.

His first real instrument was a tape recorder.

"It was the first thing I learnt to use in a creative way, I think the only way one can define a musical instrument is a piece of equipment, be it a piece of wood with metal on or a couple of engines with tape on them, that one uses to create or transform sounds."

The first things Eno did were connected with phonetic poetry rather than music and singing. He'd build up tracks with spoken words and then he'd talk over the top of them. He did this at Ipswich Art College where he was studying art.

"I was a painter ... not a very good one, incidentally."

He leans over the side of the sofa and produces a plastic bag. It's full of notebooks. In them are descriptions of his paintings. "They're far better than the paintings, they really are" (that eye-sparking laugh again) "someone's making a film about the notebooks at the moment."

He opens one. It's full of minute writing and diagrams. They go back to when he was about 16 and look like Leonardo da Vinci's earliest doodlings.

"Then I gradually found myself becoming more and more interested in avant garde music."

He found that music was a much quicker medium than painting and therefore more satisfying to him. There wasn't such a gap between the formation of an idea and its execution. That's why he rarely finished a painting. He'd already conceived another idea and the old one bored him.

His paintings are unfinished or completed in "a very unconvincing way. They looked as if I'd got bored half-way through, which in fact is what had happened."

Music was that much more immediate. As soon as you start you're making sounds. "It's an activity that has a more direct emotional appeal."

That's why most of the art forms revolve around music, says Eno. He shifts his light bulk in the sofa. His empty stomach is causing some aggravation.

He got into rock music in 1969. He was a singer for a short while before returning to the avant garde fold. But it was an important few months. The group was Maxwell Demon.

Their music, says Eno, was "not unlike some of the stuff on my album actually. It was very advanced in some ways but backward in others. We didn't rehearse very much and I never used to write lyrics, or not very much. I used to improvise them which is, in fact, how most of the lyrics in this (solo album) are done."

Eno improvises and then writes the lyrics down — "the way I write lyrics is very interesting ... I don't know if I should reveal it before I patent it."

Maxwell Demon was an ambitious project. It took a lot of confidence to get on stage with ten minutes rehearsed music and play for an hour. By definition, improvisatory bands like that often do things which don't work out. Eno found it "quite nerve-racking."

"I thought it craved the indulgence of the audience a bit too much really, but it was a very useful experience because it indicated that I did have a feeling for rock music that I wasn't aware of before, and also that I really loved singing. I really loved it, very, very much. And I never forgot that."

After Maxwell Demon broke up Eno thought that this flirtation with rock had come to an end. The fact that he couldn't play an instrument was the problem once again, he'd be a luxury in any group.

Then in early 1971 a group was formed that needed a luxury addition. Eno joined Roxy. He'd known Andy Mackay from some work they'd done on one or two avant garde electronic music things.

One of the reasons Eno thinks he was asked to join is because he wouldn't play the instrument in an ordinary way, "which is the most pedestrian and boring way imaginable where they treated it as an extended Farfisa organ."

It's not as good as a Farfisa for that type of work says Eno, and anyway he thinks that the term Synthesizers should be extended to include the more general term "electronics." The people he likes for electronics are Phil Spector, Jimi Hendrix. People who realise that "what they're doing is a whole extended process right up to the loudspeakers."

"I don't like synthesizers I must confess at this stage. They've got so many bad associations."

He's always asked about people like Walter Carlos and so on but says "I'm totally

The collaboration happened quite by accident when Eno mentioned to Fripp that he's invented something that treated guitar sounds in an unusual way. Bob popped in one night tried out the device, immediately realised what was happening to the sounds and adapted to it, played to it as though it was the most natural thing to do.

"The first side of that album took literally 45 minutes to make. Nobody believes that because there were about 50 guitars on it and it wasn't doctored or anything."

Eno has "invented" a whole mess of things that relate to the use of tape recorders. Once you accept, he says, that all you're dealing with is time and the ability to hold things from the past it's quite simple.

"Nothing I've ever done with a tape recorder is brilliant ... it's just obvious if you think of what the true function of a tape recorder is — if you think of it as an automatic musical collage device."

Brian Eno reckons he'll perform on stage again at sometime, but no heavy touring. "I think what I'm doing at the moment is much more important to me than performing anyway."

He prefers the studio. It's become his natural environment. He doesn't feel it necessary to direct musicians. He just listens to what they're playing and "then I'll take what they're doing and say 'What position does this put me in' and 'how can I justify the musical idea to suit'."

what sounds I want, though in technical terms I might not be able to express them as well."

In many ways he sounded like Willie Mitchell describing the development of the "Al Green" sound.

Eno has already started on his second solo album. It sounds, judging by the tapes he played me, an extension of the first album. No new directions, just working the same field, a bit more.

He shifts in the sofa again and looks uncomfortable, pained. A bit more talk about Roxy perhaps.

He enjoyed America when they were there. Not the playing but the stimulating tension of New York, Los Angeles, and Chicago.

"I get the feeling that I enjoyed America more than anyone else in Roxy. It was disappointing in terms of playing because it was a very badly structured tour."

Eno hates touring. So much time is wasted in travelling so little is spent on music. On that US tour he worked out that they were in America for four or five weeks. In all they played ten hours music. Such a waste.

Now he's left Roxy the group has, apparently, eased off the glamour. "I assume they'll have replaced it with some other kind of image. I don't know. But Roxy is in a position now where it doesn't have to push itself in any way. People are going to come to the concerts however the band looks or however they play," he laughs that twinkling laugh.

It's true, it's evidently true. That accent, The do something it gets responded to well so you do it a bit more and you keep doing it more until the response starts failing off."

He's always been doing things like the glam bit though. "It wasn't a difficult thing to do. I didn't suddenly think I'm gonna change my life and do this, it just seemed like a natural thing for me to do."

He shifts once more. Lights a cigarette. The pause lengthens. That smile erupts. "It's connected with sexual affairs quite strongly I should imagine. In a way that I can't amplify on either."

Then let us talk, I suggested, about the avant garde label he's trying to set up.

At present there's Gavin Briars and there's the Portsmouth Sinfonia.

Briars, it seems, happened to be walking under Waterloo Arches in 1968 with a portable tape recorder in hand. He recorded a tramp singing a hymn — "Jesus Blood."

He made a tape loop of it, wrote a score for it, hired a small orchestra and recorded each instrument coming in one at a time. First strings, then bass, then tuba, the organ etc. So that over this "very sad, broken old voice" a beautiful orchestra builds up.

Sounds a bit like "Amazing Grace" to me but Eno reckons it'll get compared to Terry Riley. Everything avant garde gets compared to Terry Riley, he says, and cites a review of the Fripp/Eno album as evidence.

The Sinfonia are, says Eno, "A group of musicians of ing, but Eno's enthusiastic about it. "The vast majority of these people can't play their instruments and yet they are definitely producing music."

Brian Eno is the clarinetist in the Portsmouth Sinfonia: "and if you think I'm bad at guitar" ... the smile glows again.

There's also another project he's toying with. "I actually thought of writing a piece of music and not using rock musicians at all for it and yet try to make it sound like rock music. People like Winifred Atwell and Larry Adler and Percy Edwards. It would be just amazing to get them into a studio to try to make rock music with them."

Though he may be feeling physically drained at the moment, Eno's been talking for almost two hours with infectious enthusiasm. If he sells enough solo albums, he may get on the road but it'll have to be a short tour.

Travelling is, he reiterates, an unproductive chore and his health deteriorates and he needs a long time after to get creatively thinking again. He's unsure whether the usefulness of playing live is worth the aggravation, though it does feed a certain side of his ego.

Eno on stage getting the buzz from the crowds, roaring through the encore ("Roxy always played best on encores") then slumping like a zombie in the dressing room. Is that all there is?

"Inevitably you want something more to happen to carry the feeling on." A recording studio back at the bored by them, I really am."

In electronics and avant garde music, John Cage has most influenced him as a theorist; Morton Feldman has been most important as a composer. "The idea of music as being just a chunk out of a longer continuum has always appealed to me. That's why I like the Velvet Underground. You get the feeling with a lot of their tracks that they started many years before and they'll end many years later and you're hearing is just a chunk taken out somewhere and put on to the record."

Much of Eno's solo album has that same feeling; quite a lot of the Fripp/Eno set has it too.

"I just find myself so happy in studios ... (that laugh again) ... so happy I just spend my life in them and feel very tired and very ill as a result."

The musicians on the solo album, says Eno, don't mind his manipulation of their sound. They know what to expect when they play on his sessions ... "if nothing else I'm known as being a mutator of sound."

"I learnt very much doing this album. I did this very quickly. I recorded it in 12 days so it's quite a cheap album."

He had a good relationship with the engineer, which was important for his type of work. "Empirically I know

"tees" and "aitches" are beginning to fall away like autumn leaves. "After a while so many assumptions are made about your music, the audience is actually hearing assumptions rather than sounds. It really is irrelevant how Roxy play — for a while anyway."

Eno, by the way, thinks they play very well but were under-rehearsed for the start of their tour. He'll probably go see them at the Rainbow.

Had Eno developed is "glamorous" image deliberately? Was this a slight blush?

"I don't think one does consciously plan out a campaign that way. What tends to happen is that you varying degrees of competence." Some can play, some can't; some can read music; some can't. There seem to be more can't than cans.

They try to play the popular classics seriously but their untutored personnel ensures it comes out sounding very funny. The violin section for instance, has a good lead violinist whose fingering is copied by the man sitting next to him, who is copied by the one next to him and so on.

"So there's a delay in terms of time and a decay in terms of accuracy ... you get this very lush feeling to the thing."

It may sound pretty appailhotel would get some great music taped, he says. The release, of course, would usually come in wenching and clubbing. Apparently, unlike the rest of Roxy (see last week's MM), Eno had little trouble in this direction. Did he miss that aspect of the road, that type of release?

He got up from the sofa and disappeared into the kitchen. He returned with a plate. On it rested half a pineapple. He bit squelchily into its flesh just as a somewhat gorgeous female creature walked into the living room. A Lizard Girl?

Brian Eno munches at the pineapple. It looked like he was starting to eat again anyway.

STUDENT STATEMENT

THE Wailers tour next month indicates a significant change of attitude among students towards ethnic black music. Thirteen out of the twenty dates the Jamaican reggae group will be playing are colleges.

Not so long ago this kind of band would have been unthought of for campus audiences.

It was the Wailers' successful tour last spring that enlightened a lot of social secretaries. Island found an initial reluctance among them to book the group, but now the company prophesies more than just a groundswell of interest in the future.

Big surprise of the spring tour was that the Wailers went down fine at college venues but bombed out entirely at traditional reggae clubs. Island put it down to the fact that the group were not flash enough for the clubs.

At the colleges, however, the Wailers' rough and ready nature was right.

Island's Maggie McCurry said: "It woke up the colleges and everybody breathed a sigh of relief. The more adventurous social secretaries took the Wailers first and now others have picked up on them."

"Colleges are more prepared to accept things a bit out of the ordinary now. But it took a lot to convince them the Wailers would go down well."

A word of warning though to social secretaries of those 13 Unions who've booked the group; don't lay on any food. The Wailers insist on eating only food they buy and cook themselves. Especially, they will never touch pork.

A CENTRAL BANK of information on entertainments may well be set up soon for social secretaries.

Based in London and staffed by the NUS, the bank would provide a two-way feedback between colleges and agencies, and also facts relating to groups and artists on the circuit.

This idea was just one to come out of the National Soc. Secs. Conference at Hatfield, where 100 colleges were represented. One of the members of the conference steering committee, Andy Murray, of Leeds Poly, said the object was "to combat the general feeling of people being ripped off by agencies."

The file would include fees charged by bands, dates available and even whether the artists concerned were reasonable or unreasonable in their behaviour.

"The point is not to black bands indiscriminately," said Andy. "It's merely to provide some information as to whether a band are unprofessional in their attitude." The file would not be secret and could be inspected by anyone.

It would also protect the inexperienced social secretary and improve their communication.

There is also a possibility being considered of forming a "brokerage" system for colleges, and in this way the information bank is seen as only an interim measure.

A central clearing house for acts is envisaged. If a college wanted a particular group, they would go to the NUS direct and special "brokers" would handle all negotiations. Soc. secs. would not then have to deal with the business side themselves.

Thoughts are, too, that soc. secs. will be organised into areas across the country to co-ordinate events and hold regular meetings. This, it is said, would prevent one college being played off against another.

STRANGE happenings at Leeds Poly carry more than a hint of warning to college entertainments organisers everywhere.

First, the Poly S.U. has just passed a motion preventing the social secretary from booking any bands or solo performers who are not fully paid up members of the Musicians Union.

And secondly, the local authority has slapped a noise limit on the Poly, and all other entertainment venues in the city. Will other authorities be following suit? The Leeds limit is 93 decibels, which rules out the average disco and most groups.

Andy Murray, cultural affairs vice-president at the Poly, denounced the Musicians Union ruling as "purely political".

He said: "The Students Union don't know anything about the M.U. They're just in favour of a closed-shop

Black power!

by Jeff

policy and because the M.U. is a union, they're saying it must be supported, regardless of whether it actually does anything for groups."

Andy, of course, has been put in a most difficult position, faced with a task of finding out which groups have M.U. personnel and which don't. He will have to get the information from agents and sign contracts only in good faith.

"It's a totally unworkable situation," he added, "an arbitrary and repressive decision. It imposes the decision to join a union."

An attempt will be made to get the motion rescinded, but the noise controls which have been imposed on public health grounds look like being a bigger problem in the long run.

The controls take effect from January 1. Anyone who holds a music and dancing licence in Leeds will be obliged to keep music within 93 decibels, two metres from the speakers. Inspectors with noise meters will drop in now and again to see that the law is being kept.

The Poly have measured their own disco which gives out well over 93 decibels, but which is normally acceptable to an audience.

Of course, group sound goes much higher: ELO were measured at 110 decibels when they appeared at the college. Now a clause on decibel output will have to be introduced into contracts.

A QUADROPHONIC road show is going down big in universities all over the country. So big in fact, that some social secretaries have made profit out of it — when in fact the show is put on free by WEA.

Some colleges have charged entry and now WEA are going to stipulate that in future admission MUST be free.

The show has already been to 16 of the largest universities; next on the list are Loughborough (November 8), Swansea (12) and Southampton (15). WEA would welcome invitations from more campuses.

Colleges are offered a comprehensive show including disco, lights, films, giveaway posters and T-shirts. WEA is able to provide the package with the financial burden largely borne by sponsors. Pioneer has provided 2,500 dollars worth of quad equipment and Fane a speaker system.

CARAVAN are full of nothing but praise for the ten colleges they have just toured, in particular Oxford Poly and Scottish venues.

John Perry (bass) said: "We were quite surprised at how much they all knew about us. It was really great. Also, colleges often find it difficult to get things together at the beginnings of years and you get new soc. secs. who perhaps haven't had much experience. But this year they've been okay and backstage organisation was very good."

"To a certain extent Caravan are categorised as a university band, and they are very important to us."

Naturally enough, Caravan will be doing another college tour next term. For the moment, they're saying thanks a lot for their recent rousing receptions.

making music:

ORGAN today is one of the most popular instruments in jazz and rock music. And yet it used to be regarded as unwieldy and strictly for Sandy McPherson and the light music recitalists.

But a combination of personal endeavour, imagination and technical advance has made the electric organ one of the most powerful voices of musical expression, and its exponential rate in popularity with the biggest stars in popular music.

The rise of the organ — if one may use the phrase — is indeed a fascinating story. Back in the 'thirties they used to talk about "The Mighty Wurlitzer." This was the spectacular instrument that rose from the orchestra pit of cinemas across the country.

The electric organist was a man in charge of seemingly limitless power, like a steam locomotive driver. At a time when acoustic instruments were the rule, the cinema organ, derived from the hand pumped pipe organ of old, seemed revolutionary.

But the mechanics of the cinema organ meant it was unsuited to any kind of swinging jazz or pop music. The delayed actions were just not responsive enough for brisk syncopation. That inveterate swinger Fats Waller used organ occasionally, but was much happier on the more flexible piano.

The arrival of the portable electric organ which eschewed pipes, made it suitable for itinerant dance band musicians, and among the earliest exponents in America was Milt Herth, whose trio included jazz musicians O'Neil Spencer on drums and Teddy Bunn guitar. Yet another pioneer was Fela Sowande who accompanied singer Adelaide Hall.

But it wasn't until Milt Buckner, pianist with Lionel Hampton, switched to organ that things began to swing.

Jimmy Smith is acknowledged as the man who gave the Hammond organ its first authentic jazz voice, playing the instrument with tremendous verve and drive, developing a technique that utilised all its potential for real blues power. The impact of recordings like "Walk On The Wild Side" was enormous.

Organs—the sound of soul

The organ could sound like a big band in itself, and it is interesting to note that Wild Bill Davis, a pianist who switched to organ in 1948, wrote the sensational arrangement of "April In Paris" for Count Basie's orchestra, with sweeping organ chords in mind.

Organ-based small groups became tremendously popular in jazz with a whole gamut of players from Shirley Scott to Jimmy McGriff. While Jimmy Smith tended to become more and more flamboyant and extravagant, there were more tasteful players like Groove Holmes and one of the best was Brother Jack McDuff, whose band, with men like Harold Vick on tenor, George Benson guitar and Joe Dukes on drums, was one of the finest in jazz.

The organ lent itself well to rhythm and blues, and John Patton and Jimmy McGriff were among those players who inspired the surprise boom in Hammond organists on the fledgling British group scene of the mid-sixties. With the massive volume created by electric guitars, keyboard players had to switch to the organ to survive and anyway, it made a welcome alternative to playing out-of-tune uprights.

Years before the phrase "jazz-rock" became current, there were bands steaming away in clubs like London's famed Flamingo, where Georgie Fame, John Mayall, Zoot Money, Chris Farlowe and Graham Bond urged their musicians onwards from stools at the keyboard.

This was an exciting time when barriers between pop, jazz and rock came tumbling down, and musicianship could get a word in amidst the hullabaloo of day-to-day pop.

Most of the organists were either ex-rock and roll pianists like Georgie Fame, or came out of the jazz world like Graham Bond, who in fact switched from alto, after leaving the Don Rendell Quintet.

In the case of the Blue Flames, the organ provided a fountain of warm, funky chords to a swinging front line.

John Mayall's band in Flamingo days also featured a Hammond organ, and John played it much as he would his piano and harmonicas, charged with blues feeling.

George Bruno Money led one of the most popular and entertaining bands. Zoot was as much into goodtime music and looning as John Mayall was into the blues. Like the Blue Flames, the Big Roll Band featured a fine brass team.

by Chris
Welch

Chris Farlowe's band was smaller but a hothouse of talent. There was the shy and retiring Albert Lee on guitar, and the young Dave Greenslade on organ, now of course, leader of his own band. A latter addition to the band was an even younger Carl Palmer on drums, then aged 15.

Making far greater use of the organ as a solo instrument was Graham Bond with the mighty Organisation. Graham leapt into the Hammond with demonic power, connecting the organ to a Leslie speaker cabinet which increased its tonal range and, significantly, introducing Bach-like chords on his famed version of "Wade In The Water," a soul-jazz hit originally made popular by Johnny Griffin's band.

This brush with Bach and indeed the whole arrangement of "Wade In The Water," which featured Ginger Baker on drums with Dick Heckstall-Smith (tenor and Jack Bruce (bass), was to have great effect on many young musicians, pointing the way to progressive instrumental rock music. Bill Bruford, now drumming with King Crimson, has frequently stated that the Bond recording was a great influence in the early days of Yes.

But the first rock organist with a technique to equal the finest American players, was Brian Auger, who came to fame with Steam Packet and later The Trinity. Another renegade jazz pianist, Brian was first under the spell of Smith and McGriff, but soon established his own style and later added his own vocals to the Trinity sound.

Big spenders on the home front

Bond, made up the fearful crew of looners who terrorised the London discotheque scene of the sixties.

After these pioneers, and hard at their heels came the later breed of organists, Jon Lord with the Artwoods, who later formed Deep Purple, was another Jimmy Smith man, who used to feature an excellent version of "Walk On The Wild Side," with Keef Hartley on drums.

Don Shinn who lead the Soul Agents, was another highly respected organist. His band distinguished themselves by tactlessly playing Graham Bond Organisation numbers at the Marquee one night, when they were supporting the Bond men. It led to ructions, I seem to recall.

The outstanding organ hit record of the era was undoubtedly "A Whiter Shade Of Pale," in '67 which made Procol Harum a household name. The organ became an integral part of the booming underground scene, and it was featured in groups like Pink Floyd, Procol, Soft Machine, and the Crazy World Of Arthur Brown. Vincent Crane, with Arthur, was one of the most exciting players of this period, and still is of course with Atomic Rooster.

But the band which did most for the organ's status in its battle with the guitar, was the Nice. Keith Emerson gave the instrument new flexibility and scope. Playing from the standing position, Keith attacked the instrument like a guitar. And his widespread influences, from jazz to the classics, made him one of the greatest entertainers in rock.

John Lord also made a great contribution in widening the scope of the organ in rock, with as wide a range of tastes as Keith, and a similarly advanced technique. Today, the brightest new star on the instrument is Rick Wakeman, who came up with the Strawbs and replaced Tony Kaye in Yes.

This year Rick topped Keith Emerson in the organ polls, but Rick is still developing as a musician and the full strength of his contribution will be felt in the years to come.

All these fine musicians have brought something new or added a personal touch to the organ, helping to make it one of the most popular instruments in the world.

MAKE no mistake — although the word boom may perhaps be a slight overstatement — there is still a busy and thriving market in electronic organs.

But not only among the pop groups.

Says Bill Swan jnr., of Swans of Manchester, one of the big provincial piano and organ dealers:

"Trade is certainly buoyant and we still sell to groups, and to pubs and clubs — but well over 50 per cent of organ sales today are for home use.

"The reasoning is quite simple — just a matter of economics and social trends. Today the general mass of people have more leisure time than ever before due to shorter working hours, and simply, they are buying organs.

"From the trader's point of view the market is a big one. Take any mass of people — and probably 95 per cent of them cannot play a musical instrument. They are all our potential customers.

"In fact over recent months we ourselves have sold instruments to a wide variety of people — firemen, bus drivers, teachers, lawyers, doctors, yes — even to a refuse collector.

"Only occasionally do new groups buy an expensive organ — but many acquire one, once they become established."

"And being on the road, they usually require the portable type, to such a degree that these are now becoming very sophisticated instruments and can cost their purchasers as much as £1,000!

Brian Cooper at CBS-Arbiter in London's Tottenham Court Road, has similar comments to make.

"I would say that as much as 80 per cent of our organ sales are for home use, but so many groups are not yet into keyboards that the market is still good, even in this field.

"But the newcomer to this particular scene is climbing steadily and has yet to make its big impact. I am of course, referring to synthesisers. The trade generally has not yet got the hang of them but will certainly have to jump in fairly soon.

"I think that dealers are concerned as to whether or not it is a musical instrument or just an electronic gimmick. As a former student at the Royal College of Music I can assure them that I have found the synthesiser to be very educational.

"Prices are not outrageous — around £700 — and sales are increasing slowly but surely. Dealer push could help this along." — JERRY DAWSON.

DAVE McRAE,
keyboards player with Nucleus and a noted session man, talks to Laurie
Henshaw

DAVE McRAE, who plays with Ian Carr's Nucleus, also has a wealth of experience on keyboard instruments as a much-in-demand session man for recording and film work. He's played on sessions for Cliff Richard, Olivia Newton-John and Mama Cass — to name but a few — played for a film score which Mike Gibbs wrote for the Bette Davis film, Madam Sin, and will also be heard on a forthcoming Cliff Richard movie.

He was also previously with Matching Mole, with which he recorded two albums. "The one titled 'Matching Moles Little Red Record' is the one most of interest to those into electronic keyboards," says Dave. "I think the organ is losing a little favour these days. It just got hammered to death for a while. Groups are more inclined to use strings or Mellotrons."

Did Dave think the sound of the electric piano was more suited to groups than the organ?

"Not really. But there are several different kinds of electric piano. I use a Fender Rhodes electric piano. It's very distinctive — it has a quality of its own. It has become distinctive in the same way that a Hammond

You can learn a lot from Stevie Wonder organ is very recognisable. The Fender is the one that is most like an acoustic piano to play. The others are more like organs.

"But the electronic keyboards are not so much taking over from guitars as taking over from having four or six horn players really.

With a couple of good, hefty amplifiers you can produce a variety of sounds that can simulate what used to be trumpet, trombone, saxophone or something.

"From that point of view, it's much easier as a working unit for a band to have one keyboard player who can the keys required to produce a note.

Electronic pianos tend to have an "organ" feel, which isn't always to everyone's taste.

The sound is something else again. Everyone admits that the popularity of piano in rock, for instance, has a lot to do with the original virtue of artificial pianos, their compactness and lightness.

It is difficult to go on the road with an acoustic piano, be it upright or baby grand.

Then there is the hassle of miking a piano — the breadth of the keyboard brings on all kinds of problems. But an artificial piano can be taken anywhere there's a mains plug.

Why, then, do musicians use a miked acoustic when they can arrange it? Obviously, because years of hearing acoustic piano music has made that particular sound "correct" and "good," and worse yet, because the finest electric or electronic piano made can usually be told from even an average acoustic.

This is because an acoustic piano puts out a very complicated sound, loaded with odd resonances, harmonics, rattles, clunks, mistunings, and so forth. The better the piano, the "drier" the sound, in purely acoustic terms.

Organs, then. Let it first be said that a good electronic organ is a much "truer" sound to our ears than an electronic piano, mainly because the original — the pipe organ — is rarely heard these days, so we have less chance for comparison. Still the same holds: an electronic organ can't really compete with a huge pipe organ which can cover a wider frequency range than any other instrument — say 16Hz-8,700 Hz.

But again, the electronic organ is portable and can be amplified to any necessary volume (or louder), whereas a good concert pipe organ weighs quite a few tons, is securely fixed to quite a large area, and some of the larger models are equipped with blower-engines developing up to 400 bhp!

Electronic organs work on a variety of principles; there are too many to list here, so we'll confine ourselves to the most popular and widely used. These, again, divide themselves into electro-mechanical and purely electronic types.

The Hammond, for instance, is electro-mechanical. The notes are produced by a series of discs turned by a motor; the points on their rims, according to the note to be produced, and as these high points pass a magnet, they vary a magnetic field which induces a current in a coil according to the frequency of the note.

This signal is taken from the coil and amplified. Obviously, all these guts require a bit of space, so Hammonds and organs which use similar (though different) methods are on the bulky side.

Another system, used in the famous Wurliizers, and which comes closest to a pipe organ

"These days, most people want to start playing the organ if they're pop musicians."

Is there a different technique for electric piano? "Each piano has its own technique," says Dave. "Each person develops his own technique. And all people who develop a distinctive sound develop their own techniques in playing as well."

How does Dave feel about the use of synthesizers? "I don't actually use them on concerts or recordings very much, but I know how they produce sounds."

"I've added various attachments to my electric piano to change the sound to suit myself and I think it becomes a bit more personal that way."

"But synthesizers are changing every day and there are many, many brands available these days on which you can obtain different sounds."

"But I think, when a group gets hold of a synthesiser, the sudden power at their disposal can be a bit frightening, and most people seem to go overboard. On the other hand, a lot of audiences seem to be well knocked out when people go overboard."

"But in pop music, Stevie Wonder uses synthesizers with incredible taste. Any pop people — anybody — interested in the synthesiser can really learn a lot from what he's done."

"The thing about this, of course, is that on records he's helped by a team — one of them is Malcolm Cecil. He was an English bass player, who lives in Los Angeles or New York and he specialises in synthesiser sounds for people."

"He does Stevie Wonder's records along with some other geezers. They sort it out and he gets what he wants and really makes sure it is recorded correctly. So you have all their knowledge behind his records as well. The novice is not going to come up with those sounds initially."

"But there are synthesizers on the market — like the ARP and EMS — that are very popular today, and they're within a price range people can afford."

"They're workable and they have a good variety of sounds on them. The more you want from a synthesiser, the more you have to pay for them."

"It's only recently that Keith Emerson, for example, has got the prototype of a Moog that can play more than one note. I don't know if you realise it, but every album that's made by a synthesiser is done one note at a time — one line at a time, which makes it very tedious. So consequently when you come to a stage performance, unless you have several, you can't do very much."

"For example, you couldn't produce 'Switched On Bach' on the stage without many players and many synthesizers. But Keith has just been to America and he has a Moog — designed by Bob Moog — that can produce more than one note."

"For electronic effect and for electric piano playing Herbie Hancock is very inventive, I think. He has an exceptional talent. He has a new album called 'Sextant' where he more than ever utilises electronic effects."

"For straight electric piano playing, there's Chick Corea. There's a lot of good Fender playing on his album called 'Light As A Feather' — though in more conventional style."

"There's also an album I did with Gordon Beck and Ian Carr called 'Labyrinth' which has us playing together and separately, which I think — though I'm advertising! — is definitely worth listening to."

"If you take Herbie Hancock and Chick Corea as the jazz players, and Stevie Wonder as the kind of pop player, that really covers most of the area."

"Are the Americans more advanced in the use of electronic keyboard instruments than the British?"

"I think that the studio set-ups in some cases are slightly more advanced in America, but internationally, it's predominantly the same."

"Recording studios are fairly standard, really, in how much equipment they've got and what they can do for you. Some are better than others. The best are the most expensive and the worst are the cheapest."

"As far as using synthesizers and electronics are concerned, I think the Americans are generally a little more aesthetic, if that's the word."

"They use a lot more, in fact, throughout Europe than in Britain — synthesizers especially. But they tend to really throw it all on and throw caution to the winds. I think the Americans are more tasteful."

A LONG with ELP, Greenslade share the distinction of being a keyboard-based band — one of the few British groups dominant in this sphere.

Dave Greenslade plays RMI electric piano and also Mellotron, while Dave Lawson features a Hammond A 100 organ and ARP synthesiser.

"So there are four keyboard instruments," says Dave Lawson. "Soon, I'm getting a Hohner Clavinet, and Dave Greenslade is probably getting a Fender Rhodes electric piano. I'm also hoping to add flute and soprano sax — I played woodwind instruments while I was in the RAF."

"Our accent is on keyboards. Instead of using guitar in a lead role or backing role, we get the same effects with keyboards. Dave (Greenslade) will probably play lead and I may play a backing role — as we would a rhythm guitar — plus some lead lines here and there."

Dave Lawson feels that the keyboard instruments have brought to the rock bands a more chordal structure and more adventurous harmonies. "You can achieve more than guitars, which tend to concentrate on single lines; keyboard instruments give more colour and tone to a group than guitars, which tend to be somewhat limited."

"The Mellotron, of course, is capable of a tremendous range of sounds, as it uses pre-recorded tapes. Dave (Greenslade) has tapes of violins, cellos and basses and flutes. Another lot of tapes features voices, giving a choral effect, and the sound of a vibraphone — without the motor. There's also a tape of a full orchestra. So there's quite a selection to choose from."

"The synthesiser? That's a new toy. I've had one for three or four months, and it's the only type of keyboard instrument that can bend a note like a guitar. Again, you can produce a wide variety of sounds."

"But I prefer to use it as an electronic instrument in its own right and not copy the sound of a guitar or saxophone."

How do Greenslade produce their overall sound? "We write a song and build on that," says Dave. "There can be a danger of getting too complex, but usually we come up with an idea on tape, play it to the rest of the band and get them interested in building on that."

What advice would Dave give to a group venturing into keyboards? "Two years ago, I would have said 'no' to an electric piano," says Dave.

"They tended to be unreliable. But they have improved tremendously, and Dave's RMI piano gives a powerful sound and is very reliable."

"But it really depends on what type of sound a group is aiming to achieve. If you are a rock band, then the stabbing sound of an electric piano can give a really funky effect."

"But if you want a fuller orchestral sound and like ballad things like Crosby, Stills and Nash, then an organ is probably better."

Keyboard-based groups Dave recommends listening to are ELP ("I haven't heard too much of them, but what I have heard is very effective") and records featuring Herbie Hancock, who was with Miles Davis ("who apart from obtaining some very pretty sounds, gets some really muddy effects in the bass region").

Herbie Hancock is a good example of the way to use a synthesiser, and Billy Preston's keyboard work shows distinct jazz leanings.

Stevie Wonder brings a relatively simple approach to keyboards, but he seems to get a very fine sound.

"The big danger in using keyboards is to get too complex. It's good to be adventurous, but it's no use trying to blind your listeners with complex arrangements and technique. Keep the sounds simple and melodic — so that your audience can identify with you."

"It's no use playing above their heads. To sum up, use your keyboard instruments — whatever type you choose — with taste and discretion."

— LAURIE HENSHAW.

play all these noises than to have several musicians travelling all over the place. It's nearly always down to economics.

"If you just play acoustic piano it's not sufficient. But you can't just suddenly carry five different keyboard instruments, though — a synthesiser, an electric piano and an organ and pretend that you know how to play them, because you don't."

"You just have to sit down, find out what's been done before and figure out how to develop your own technique. They take time to develop, you know."

sound, is the vibrating electrostatic generator. This is the linear descendant of the harmonium (I've got one of those as well, but it's too much trouble to pump the pedals) and relative of the harmonica.

Obviously, this is a reed system, and the reeds are vibrated by blown air; the reed is made of metal and an electrode is mounted near the free end, then the reed and electrode are polarised (like opposite poles of a magnet) and the reed vibrates, forming a kind of variable capacitor. Again, the signal is taken off and amplified.

The last, and most popular and compact system, is the oscillator. This is, like the electronic piano, a purely electronic system with no moving parts and no sound until the loudspeaker stage. There are two ways of using oscillators to generate a keyboardful of notes: you can either use one oscillator for each note, which is complicated, expensive, and a bit silly, or you use one oscillator for each note of the scale, then use a frequency divider on each note to get the octaves you need.

Finally, the synthesiser. In some ways, the larger synthesizers seem to be the ultimate musical instruments.

Including the synthesiser as a keyboard is a bit misleading, since synthesizers can be controlled by almost any assembly, from guitar fretboard to digital computer, but the keyboard is certainly the easiest and most often used method.

A synthesiser is really nothing more than a set of oscillators — like those used in organs — which generate certain types of waves: sine or "pure" waves, squarewaves which sound hard, like fuzz, and sawtooth or ramp waves, which are sinewaves with many harmonics added.

The output of these oscillators are controlled by the control voltage from the keyboard, which varies their frequency to the note desired. The sound is fleshed out by a series of high and low filters which block parts of the signal, noise generators which give out sounds like radio static (white noise), and envelope shapers to control the attack, individual component-of-note loudness, and decay of the sound.

The envelope shaper is possibly the most interesting part of the synthesiser. In that it is the part responsible for much of the variety of sound available — especially musical sound as opposed to noises.

The "envelope" of a sound determines whether it will sound like — say — a flute or a toad. More important is the middle section of the envelope. Does the sound "swell out" (like a tuning fork or gong, or does it drop down quickly, like a drum or a plucked string? Does the low frequency content hang on like a piano resonance, or does the high frequency become confused and random like a cymbal note?

The only other "electronic" instrument with such a huge sound capability is the Mellotron, with its loops of stored tapes, and even the Mellotron is disqualified because it doesn't generate its own sounds; they are recorded from the original strings or voices.

So, considering the wide range of sound and more important — shapes of sounds available to a synthesiser, even the human voice could be replaced!

Nice one, Refugee

A VAST there! Make way for a fine new band, steaming at a rate of knots over the Horizon. Yes, it's Refugee, a crew of talented musicians, whose arrival at the great port of rhythm will delight fans and critics alike.

For Refugee are two thirds of the old Nice, one of the finest groups of the sixties, plus a brilliant young keyboard player who has sailed in from the unknown, one Patrick Moraz.

Brian Davison on drums and Lee Jackson on bass guitar and vocals, are two Nice musicians whose careers took an unsteady course after Keith Emerson quit them to form Emerson, Lake and Palmer.

That was back in 1970 when the Nice finally broke up after four years of pioneering work. Brian formed his own group, Everywhich Way with Graham Bell as lead singer, and Lee formed Jackson Heights.

Everywhich Way did not survive long, and Jackson Heights went through many changes, before Lee decided to pack it in earlier this year. Then rumours began to spread, particularly in the Nellie Dean, a Soho pub where musicians congregate and the business does its business.

The story was that a new band called The Nice was to be formed. This was kept a dark secret for fear of treading on any toes concerned. Eventually the gaff was blown, and the public led to believe a new Nice were on the way. Not so. For Refugee are well, let's hear the story from Lee, who explains how Melody Maker helped in its formation.

"There was a difference of musical opinion in Jackson Heights, particularly between me and keyboard player Brian Chapman, and I decided to pack it in. Patrick Moraz was a keyboard player I had met with the Nice in Basle, Switzerland, back in 1969 and we had always kept in touch. He had sat in on piano with Keith Emerson in a hotel, and knocked everybody out. I called Patrick up to talk about forming a group just after Easter, and man, that's about it.

by

"What sealed it was an article by Roy Hollingworth in Melody Maker, when he said the Nice was a group he'd like to see reform. I thought, when you have all that goodwill, why the hell not have a go? I went to see Brian and then I rang Patrick.

"Sure I wanted to do the acoustic thing at first with Jackson Heights and that lasted for three years. When I wanted the music to get heavy again, the others didn't want to know, so I folded the band after Easter. Brian, Patrick and I went to see Tony Stratton-Smith and Johnny Toogood, and they have helped us a tremendous amount to get the thing cracking."

Said Brian: "Patrick is an incredible musician and it's a pleasure to work with him. And Lee has come on so much since the Nice days, in his singing and writing. It's a great pleasure for me to be involved with them — really!"

The group seemed so keen to play, even as we sat at the battered tables of Ye Olde Red Lion in Fleet Street (where the original Nice took its first faltering steps), that I wondered if there was anything they didn't want to play.

"Rondo," grinned Brian. "But we'll do a couple of the old tunes. Guess which ones." I suggested "Flower King Of Flies," which was wrong. "No, everyone thinks of that. Remember the fantastic production Glyn Johns did on that? And we'll be doing 'She Belongs to Me.'"

Patrick, who has a Swiss passport, but has lived in England for some years, seemed as excited and keen as the rest. "We started the group from scratch really, and in six weeks we've got down a whole programme. No, strangely enough I wasn't a Nice fan. I never saw the Nice play."

"That's a good thing," said Brian, "because you'll be playing without any preconceived ideas. Do you know, this guy has played with Billy Cobham." Patrick smiled, and admitted he had played with many top musicians in Europe, including Eric Dolphy and Clark Terry. He has also written the music for many film scores including the arty Swiss La Salamandre which won him an award at the Cannes Film Festival.

"I'm so excited about this band," said Patrick, modestly waving away all mention of his own achievements. "Brian's style on drums is beautiful, and the three of us are crystallising into an entity. I was trained to be a classical concert pianist, and my Master in Geneva was a disciple of Pierre Boulez, but I'm not going to sling anything of that into our music."

"The music won't be too contrived although there will be arranged passages, and we have two suites written, one called 'Credo' and the 'Grand Canyon Suite," which was inspired by a recent BBC TV documentary on the canyon.

Wasn't Refugee originally going to be called the Nice? Brian: "There was a time when we were going to call the band the Nice. It was debated. But we don't want to recreate the Nice as it was, and anyway there were some undercurrents going against the idea."

Said Lee: "Me and Brian were in the Nice and that's all there is to it. The new music is going to be heavy and exciting, but we're not going to start doing souped up versions of the classics. And we don't need to play with orchestras, because today there are improved Melotrons and instruments like the synthesiser, that weren't even invented when the Nice was going."

After intensive rehearsals, Refugee are going on the road soon with a couple of warm up dates, then a concert at London's Roundhouse on December 2. They plan to start recording after Christmas, and will have their first album out in February.

"We've got enough material already for a double album," said Patrick. "And the music swings so much it makes everybody happy without getting too far out, even if some of it is in 7/4."

"It's funny," said Lee, "but when Keith called me aside one day and told me he was quitting, he suggested that Brian and I form a group with Patrick right then. But I wanted to do my own thing. I had only been the singer in the Nice because I was the only one with enough guts to have a go! But I don't care who slags my singing off now."

"We've all had a hard time in the last couple of years," said Patrick, "but it's all experience, and you can learn so much. Let's go on the road and see what happens."

"Well," said Lee, "when people first heard about us getting together some of them didn't quite like the idea. A few people suggested we were just using the name of the Nice. But we're not because the name is obsolete."

SOUL FOOD

by David Milton

LET me tell y'all — Funk is here and Funk is here to stay. Such has been the progress of this area of black magic over the last few years that many commentators on the soul scene are predicting a big breakthrough to national acclaim pretty soon — even to a point where 'Motown' is relegated to second-place.

Although it's mostly confined at the moment to the South of England between such highspots as Dunstable and Brighton, rumblings which suggest an imminent breakout are to be heard in all corners.

The other day even a top Northern soul speedo dancer mentioned to me that he was trying to get hold of as much 'funky stuff' as he could — "but it's hard to hear any up here and none of the shops stock any."

Funk in all its forms is the music of the black American ghetto — it's all about black pride and it's primitive, thereby reasserting independence from white watering-down influences a la Motown. Just as Tamlala was making black city music respectable so the kids in the twilight zones were getting deeper and deeper into the African-based rhythms that, allied to electronics, became Funk. The Black Power political thing found its parallel in the sphere of music.

James Brown is the King of Super-Funk and there's no denying it. He's the man who started it all way back in the early 60's with his protégées Anna King and

JAMES BROWN: King of Super-Funk

Bobby Byrd, and he's still up there at the top of the tree, masterminding not only his own material but also that of Fred Wesley and the J.B.s, and Maceo and the Macks, both of whom are high in the ranks of Funk favourites in this country. There have been many articles on James Brown so there's very little point in delving deeply on that one, so I decided to check out on his buddy and backing man, Fred Wesley.

"I call our music 'raw soul' cause that's just what it is, although sometimes we colour it with a few juicy jazz licks, and maybe a few sweet chords."

"I come from a jazz background down in Alabama... used to play in jazz combos till I joined up with Hank Ballard and the Midnighters round about the time they were having all their big hits in 1959. Then I was with Ike and Tina Turner for a while around 1962."

"James asked me to take over the band when Maceo left in 1970. We have what is very much a family thing going here at the People label and James runs the whole show."

"I asked Fred which of his releases was the most representative of the direction his music was headed. 'Well, 'Doin' It To Death' sold over a million copies and that's the kind of thing we like to do. But then 'Pass The Peas' and 'Gimmee Some More' were others that did well for us and they're in the same bag."

"Maceo used to back James in the days when they were the King's Men but he split in 1970 as they had an argument about the amount of control James should have over his artists."

"Maceo took just about the whole back-up band with him to a Nashville label called House Of The Fox. He had a couple of hits with them — 'Got To Getcha' and, I think it was a dedication to his music teacher, 'I Remember Mr. Banks'."

"How come then that Maceo was now back with the organisation on the People label? 'Well, I guess he didn't do too well on his own and James was always willing to have him back 'home' in the family. In fact he plays with the J.B.s most of the time and James lets him do his own thing as Maceo and the Macks with session men."

"Doing the same kind of straight Funk but unconnected with James Brown are such big-selling groups as the Ohio Players, Kool and the Gang, Fat Back Band and on a more popular front the Isley Brothers. Even Motown are catching up with Willie Hutch."

The Isleys were one of the first groups to really concentrate on Funk which they did around 1968, having set up their own T-Neck label. This was the era of "It's Your Thing" when many soul lovers felt the Isleys had well and truly flipped.

But time has shown that they are one of the few truly innovative outfits in Soul music and their new album "3 + 3" will confirm the point.

Kool and the Gang have what is at the moment the biggest selling Funk import in "Funky Stuff" a hypnotic dancer that really does you to death. They're from Jersey City and they've been blowing a storm since they changed their name from the New Dimensions in 1968.

Both Kool and The Gang and the Ohio Players attract massive crowds to their concerts and they reckon that almost 35 per cent of their audience is white.

The Players have a long pedigree, having backed Wilson Pickett in his "I Found A Love" days. They're a brass 'n' guitar eight-piece, heavy funk with a strong accent on instrumental expertise.

The Chambers Brothers in their "Time Has Come" days were one of the first soul groups to go 'heavy', mixing rock, soul and psychedelia — it was left to a group called the Parliament Funkadelic for short, to add the same influences to Funk.

Other groups in the rock/soul bag like Mandrill, War, and Bloodstone, have been well-covered of late so I had a word with a band who are rapidly becoming one of the most respected rock/funk combos in the States even though hardly any of them are black, Tower Of Power.

"We call our music 'Futuristic Funk'", said Emilio Castillo, leader of Tower of Power, "Similar to Bloodstone only heavier."

"We're into a blacker thing than most of the other groups, trying to get a sound like those guys who used to ack Sam and Dave."

"The audiences we get now are black, hip white, and chicano. We're an urban band, a band from the streets. We've had big hits with 'So Very Hard To Go' and 'Still A Young Man' and our latest 'This Time It's Real' looks like it's gonna be a big one."

There are many other bands who could be mentioned in this short survey. Certainly those with British origins like Cymande and Matata could stand an investigation. However, for the moment we should restrict ourselves to catching up on a short list of the big-selling Funk sounds of the moment.

IMPORTS: Kool and the Gang: "Funky Stuff"; Mandrill: "Mango Meat"; Ripple: "Don't Know What It Is But It Sure Is Funky"; George Soule: "Get Involved"; Jackson Five: "Get It Together"; Manu Dibango: "Dangwa"; Fat Back Band: "Nijja Walk".

U.K. RELEASES: Matata: "I Feel Funky"; Tribe "Koke"; Fred Wesley: "Doin' It To Death"; Willie Henderson: "Dance Master"; African Music Machine: "Never Name a Baby"; B.B. King: "To Know You Is To Love You".

Confident Jacksons

THE Jackson 5 are often dismissed as 'teeny-pop', mainly on account of their age and the fan following they have attracted. However, it is becoming evident that they wish to reject this image.

"Skywriter", their last album, was a clue that the Five were attempting to show just what they could do — and it worked. The success of this record and the praise it received from the press has obviously given the Jacksons a new and confident direction.

Their raw single soon to be followed by an album of the same name, is the Hal Davis-produced "Get It Together."

It's funky with that old soul spark that hits you the first time you hear it — they're following Eddie Kendricks in putting Motown back strongly into the discotheques.

The record has been rush-released over here to prevent import sales creaming off the profits so Motown must have a lot of confidence in it.

Another one that has received the rush-release treatment is the 45 from Diana Ross and Marvin Gaye entitled "You're A Special Part Of Me."

It's smooth, dramatic, and superbly performed — their styles obviously complement each other — but, well I don't know, it's so very smooth — Motown and I never did go for that.

But what about those hot-selling imports? Well number one in my book must be the raw and rapping funky Fat Back Band on "Nijja Walk." It's a mainly instrumental opus with background jive-talk vocals — it reminds me a lot of Big Youth on "Screaming Target" with its defiant street rapping. And the sax solo is one of the neatest this side of King Curtis. Nice tribute to Sam and Dave on the flip as well. I don't know who handles Perception in this country but they'd better move fast, this one is 'hot'.

Mandrill's relaxed, Latin-influenced funk gets another outing on "Mango Meat," which is an early sampler for their new album "Just Outside Of Town."

Strange one from the Stylistics though cause it seems to be more aimed at the straight pop market than the Soul scene — still that seems to be the direction that Thom Bell is headed these days and he's the boss as far as Stylistics material goes.

It's a humorous, bouncy, number called "Rock 'n' Roll Baby," which could do very well in the discotheques, but does little to instill confidence in a return to the soul peaks the boys have achieved in the past.

Looking forward to the bevy of releases imminent from the new Philadelphia International label. There are five album releases from such as Billy Paul, the O'Jays, Intruders, Harold Melvin and the BlueNotes, and a sampler featuring loads of Philly-sound hits like "Love Train" and "Me And Mrs. Jones."

U.S.A. NEWS: Eddie Kendricks' "Keep On Truckin'" hits the No. 1 slot... Sly Stone has now sold out 10 concerts at New York's Madison Square Gardens... Will you do anything to make it better?

In the not too distant future, the knowledge that you are acquiring at the moment will have to be put to practical use. Apart from the purely material need to provide yourself with a decent standard of living, other considerations will have an important bearing on what you do when you leave school.

Job satisfaction, for instance. Will you enjoy what you are doing? Will the work be worthwhile? Will it give full scope to your academic qualifications? Will you actually see the results of what you are doing?

A career in the police provides the positive answers. Society is changing quickly, and social and community problems are increasing. The developments in organised crime must be contained and increasingly complex traffic problems dealt with. The maintenance of law and order is a vital element in this changing society.

The police need men and women of integrity and intelligence to meet the challenge of these problems.

You can join as a police constable at 19. Those with good educational and other qualifications are particularly welcome. If you are between 16 and 18½ you can join as a cadet, and will be given training and the chance of further education. Especially promising men and women can be considered for a special accelerated promotion course at Bramshill Police College after a minimum of two years' service as a constable. Promotion to Sergeant and then Inspector can follow quickly with a salary of up to £2,750 (for a man — women get slightly less), more in London.

In addition, there's free accommodation or a generous, effectively tax-free rent allowance.

A career in the police is a worthwhile way of making sure that your education doesn't go to waste. If you would like further information about a policeman's life and career prospects, write for an illustrated brochure to: Police Careers Officer, Home Office (RS31) London, SW1A 1AP

"YOU just can't live in Texas if you don't have a lotta soul" — "At The Crossroads" by the Sir Douglas Quintet, 1969.

BACK in 1965, just about the biggest thing in American rock music was the elusive "English Sound." No one ever managed to define exactly what that "sound" was although, of course, it seemed to encompass everyone from the Animals and the Spencer Davis Group right through to Freddie And The Dreamers and Herman's Hermits.

Thus we saw the rise of America's punkoid bands, apeing the style and mannerisms of the British rock groups.

And one of the first people on the bandwagon, so to speak, was Texan producer Huey P. Meaux. In February 1965, he'd seen a local band in Houston, Texas. Good sound, but it needed something extra, something which would make it, well, more English. So Meaux imported organist Augie Meyer from another local band, Denny Esmond And The Goldens, and christened the new line-up the Sir Douglas Quintet.

The "Sir" prefix obviously identified them as an "English" band and, indeed, Meaux tried to pass them off as a British group.

Meaux's promo campaign worked, and in June of that year the Sir Douglas Quintet struck pay-dirt with "She's About A Mover." America's "English Sound" — complete with squeaky organ — was born. Doug Sahn, the band's leader, suddenly found himself with a Beatle haircut and the Quintet were sent on the road touring with James Brown, the Rolling Stones and the Beach Boys. The band even appeared on the TV show, Hullabaloo, where they were introduced as leading apostles of the English Sound.

But all this was patent nonsense.

Doug Sahn hadn't a snowball's chance in hell of sounding English. He was a Texan, through and through, and his music reflected the myriad influences of that State. There was blues, r&b and a lot of country music in there — first hand influences undiluted by the Stones or the Beatles.

It was commercial opportunism, sure, but at least Meaux established the Quintet as potentially one of America's biggest bands.

Meaux was a shrewd cookie. And, in fact, almost at the same time as the Quintet were first happening, he had another hit with Roy Head's "Treat Her Right."

The potential was certainly there, although not even Meaux had taken into account home sickness. Right in the middle of a nationwide American tour the band decided to jack it all in and return to Texas. And that was the end of the first phase of the Sir Douglas Quintet.

Texas has always been at the centre of Doug's music. At the age of five he won a singing contest on KMAC radio in San Antonio and two years later he was playing a Fender steel guitar, fiddle, guitar and mandolin.

There was a time, in fact, when Sahn, under the name "Little Doug" sat in with some of the greats of country music, including, would you believe, Faron Young and Hank Thompson.

And immediately prior to the formation of the Quintet, Doug was making records under his own name in Texas.

He released at least four singles, "Crazy," "Daisy," "Why Why Why," "Crazy, Crazy Feeling" and "Two Hearts in Love" although I know nothing about these records. Fax and info about them gratefully received.

The original Quintet — Sahn (vocals, guitar), Meyer (organ), John Perez (drums) and Leon Beatty (vocals, percussion) — was a brash, unsophisticated rock band with Sahn's abrasive voice and Meyer's weird organ lines as twin focal points.

That first album, recorded for Tribe Records and released in Britain by Decca in 1967, includes, obviously, "She's About A Mover" plus the band's version of Gary's U.S. Bonds' "Quarter To Three" — not quite in the same league as the original, but a creditable effort nevertheless.

The next stage in the band's career came in 1968 when Sahn, rapidly becoming paranoid about living in Texas, moved out west to California. This signalled a fundamental change in his music, especially evident with his first West Coast album, "Honkey Blues."

Sahn was without the original members of the Quintet, most of whom had stayed behind in Texas. So he put together a new band, dubbed the Sir Douglas Quintet Plus Two.

Included in the line-up were Wayne Talbert on piano, Whitney "Hershey" Freeman on bass, Martin Ferrio, Bill Atwood, Mel Martin and Frank Morin (horns), and George Rains, who is my personal choice as the ultimate rock drummer — those who saw him playing in London with Boz Scaggs two years ago will know what I mean.

The result was a fabulous musical achievement, one of the very best West Coast albums of the late sixties.

But for some reason the album bombed. And Doug decided to go back to Quintet format, with Harvey Kagan replacing Jack Barber on bass and Frank Morin on saxophone taking Leon Beatty's place.

It was, evidently, a commercial format once again — in 1969 the Sir Douglas Quintet came up with "Mendocino," a substantial

U.S. hit.

It was, like "She's About A Mover," one of those infectious pop songs built on a riff and the lyrics were hardly more than a collection of phrases: "Mendocino, Mendocino/Where life's such a groove/You blow your mind in the morning/We used to walk through the park/Make love in Mendocino."

The "Mendocino" album which followed is, perhaps, my own favourite Sir Douglas record. It has that rough quality of the original Quintet four years earlier, but Sahn's country leanings are given ample chance to develop, especially on "Lawd, I'm Just A Country Boy In This Great Big Freaky City."

The Quintet failed to capitalise on the success of "Mendocino," seldom touring and often missing schedules, and recording dates. They released another album, "Together after Five," which wasn't particularly startling, before Doug put the Quintet and the Honkey Blues team together to make "1 + 1 + 1 = 4," an album which seemed to reflect his growing frustration with the music.

The solution to his problem came in 1971 when Doug returned to Texas, joining up with Jack Barber again to produce "The Return of Doug Saldana."

This was a flawed album, but at least it contained evidence of Doug's renewed enthusiasm. It was full of Chicano rhythms — Tex-Mex music — which has always been one of Doug's recurring influences, and included T. Bone Walker's "Papa Ain't Salty," a song he was to re-record a year later for Atlantic, plus a brilliant number called "Stoned Faces Don't Lie," easily the most memorable track on the album.

But it was the end of the road for the Sir Douglas Quintet. Last year Doug signed with Atlantic, releasing an album earlier this year credited to Doug Sahn and Band which included such luminaries as Bob Dylan, David Newman and Mac Rebbanack.

But despite the all-star line-up, the album was again flawed. It did however, suggest that Doug's finest work may lie in the country music direction — the best tracks are "(Is Anybody Going To) San Antonio" and "Faded Love," both of which emerge almost as tributes to the great country fiddle player Bob Willis (who, of course, wrote the latter song).

He is one of the few people to have convincingly produced "country-rock" and his vocals have always proved his claim that he lives in Texas, you've got to have a lotta soul.

Albums: The Sir Douglas Quintet (U.S. Tribe-Britain Decca HAU 8311); Honkey Blues (U.S. only — Smash SRS 67108); Mendocino (U.S. Smash — Britain Mercury SMCL 20150); Together After Five (U.S. Smash — Britain Mercury SMCL 2086); 1+1+1=4 (U.S. only — Philips PHS 600-344); The Return of Doug Saldana (U.S. only — Philips PHS 600-353); Doug Sahn And Band (Atlantic K40466); Other albums of interest: Rough Edges (U.S. only — Mercury SRM 1-855); Released after the termination of the Sir Douglas Quintet's contract with Mercury, this album is basically a load of reject tapes of interest only to hard-core Sahnphiles.

Future Tense (U.S. only — United Artists UAS-5514) The Quintet, minus Doug Sahn, recorded this album in 1971. For Quintet freaks only. The band have also recorded another album under the name "El Quintet" although UA are undecided whether to release it.

Augie's Western Head Music Co (U.S. only — Polydor 24-4069). Presumably recorded about 1971, this is Augie Meyer's first and only solo album. Flawed, but genuinely interesting country-rock.

Louie And The Lovers (U.S. only — Epic) Sahn's first outside production work recorded in 1958.

Shotgun Willie (U.S. only Atlantic SO 7262). Just possibly the country album of 1973. Willie Nelson's first Atlantic album includes superb back-up guitar work from Doug Sahn.

Singles: She's About A Mover/We'll Take Our Last Walk Tonight (London HLU 9954); The Tracker/Blue Norther (London HLU 9982); The Story Of John Hardy/In Time (London HLU 1001); The Rain Came/Bacon Fat (London HLU 1009); Mendocino/I Wanna Be Your Mama Again (Mercury MF 1079); (Is Anybody Going To) San Antonio/Don't Turn Around (Atlantic K10293); Nitty Gritty/Tired Of Getting Burned (Atlantic K10348); Texas Tornado/Blue Horizon (U.S. only — Atlantic 2985); Michoacan/Gulf Of Mexico (U.S. only — Epic 5-10901). Credited to "Rocky And The Border Kings", this single makes no mention whatsoever of Doug Sahn — but that organ sound must be Augie Meyer. Recorded for the film Cisco Pike which, of course, includes scenes of the Sir Douglas Quintet in the recording studios. Writer of both songs, incidentally, is one Kim Fowley.

Jim O'Neal reports from Chicago on the return of JIMMY REED

BILL TYSON, Jimmy Reed's plump, denim-jacketed manager, had tackled, tied and taped the yellow and black posters up all over town.

The message: a "Welcome Home Party" for Reed, the "Big Boss Man," of the blues, Oct. 1 at the High Chaparral, 7740 S. Stony Island Ave." Reed was making his first major Chicago appearance in years.

But the High Chaparral didn't bother to put Reed's name on the marquee. Tyson couldn't afford radio or newspaper advertising, and it rained that night.

Only 100 people showed up to hear the one-time king of Chicago blues.

Perhaps the public shared the suspicions of the man at the "party" who grumbled when Reed still hadn't performed by lam: "He must be in the old folks' home — or still in the hospital."

Alcohol, hospitalisation and family problems have plagued Jimmy Reed's career.

In the 1950's and early 60's he scored hit after hit on the rhythm and blues charts: "Baby What You Want Me To Do," "Big Boss Man," "Bright Lights, Big City," "Ain't That Loving You Baby," "You Don't Have To Go," "Honest I Do," and many more.

But he became almost as famous for his drinking as for his distinctive, lazily insistent blues sound. By the mid-60's many critics considered the Mississippi born bluesman washed up.

Now, at 47, he's back, appearing sober, healthy and happy to have new managers in his long-time

JIMMY REED: unspectacular guitar lines

Shot Williams, Nolan Struck, King Edward, B. J. King, Gwen Little and Eddie C. Campbell contributed four hours of music before Reed appeared at 3 a.m.

Lacy Gibson, guitarist/vocalist with the Mill Street Depot, and guitarist Campbell were the most impressive, though B. J. King (named after Guess Who?) came up with the best lyrics on a slow B.B.-style blues about "Tricky Dick" Nixon: "Yes, you know he tricked James Brown, just like he tricked Sammy Davis Jr."

Other musicians (including Lonnie "Guitar Jr." Brooks, who once toured with Reed) and recording executives (Mel Collins of Giant Enterprises and Bill Jones of Crajon Records, among others) also came for the show.

But noticeably absent were Eddie Taylor, the guitarist who played a vital role in developing the Jimmy Reed style; Al Smith, Reed's influential ex-manager/producer; and Mary "Mama" Reed, Jimmy's wife (they're now separated) and former song writer.

Reed bounced on stage with boyish enthusiasm, grinning widely and waving to the audience.

"We love you, Jimmy," a woman shouted as she stood and applauded.

Reed beamed, adjusted his shiny Afro wig and tuned his guitar.

Each number he sang drew ardent applause from the crowd.

"My doctor told me, 'Jimmy, Jimmy you can help yourself' . . . I found out how to help myself," he drawled on his opening selection.

Other, more familiar Reed tunes followed. Reed singing and playing guitar and harmonica in pure 50's fashion — quite in contrast to both the night's previous acts and the usual Chicago blues fare these days.

Leaving the rhythm work to 14-year-old second guitarist Minford James Smith, Reed delivered some tasty, even inventive, if unspectacular guitar lines.

Though badly miked, his singing and harp playing were fine. A warm grin never left his face.

Smith, the Mill Street Depot backup group and the audience returned every smile.

WNTB blues disc jockey Atomic Mama presented Reed with a surprise plaque from Tyson, inscribed "To Jimmy Reed — the Big Boss Man — For Your Unheralded Contribution to Blues," to more cheers from the crowd.

The joyous mood ended as Reed left the stage at 3.45 a.m. Reed has been reluctant to perform in Chicago for fear his family (whom he no longer lives with) would show up and cause trouble.

A scene did ensue, as Reed's daughter, tears in her eyes, began berating Johnnie Mae Dunson, and Reed and his entourage were quickly spirited away.

Reed may have "the Brothers" licked, but it seems he still has other relatives to settle with if his comeback is to succeed.

Big Boss Man is back!

friend Johnnie Mae Dunson and Tyson, a local disc jockey and record producer.

As he told the small but enthusiastic High Chaparral crowd, "I want to let you know that the old man's still peepin' and hiding," referring to a popular Reed song of the 50's.

An assortment of little-known local blues and soul singers joined in the Welcome Home Party.

The Mill Street Depot, the Scott Brothers Band, Lee

Real blues pianists, low-down and honky, are not too thick on the ground these days. Therefore the advent of "the incredible Dave Alexander" via his Arhoolie album THE RATTLER (1967), is something to be warmly welcomed by blues-piano freaks. Alexander's blues songs and boogies are solid and traditional yet as the note puts it, "eclectic and highly modern encompassing sounds of his Texas youth up through the challenges of San Francisco bop cutting sessions and the harshness of Oakland's ghetto soul scene." Certainly he moves and grooves in the right way, pounding out an up-tempo train blues "The Rattler" (based on Meade Lewis' "Honky Tonk Train"), with proper two-armed pronoun-sion; singing and playing "The Sky Is Crying" with a controlled intensity; hammering the "Swanee River Boogie" with almost the power of Albert Ammons; rolling out slow medium piano blues on "Need A Little Spirit" or singing a more up-to-date soul style on "Good Home Cooking" and "There Ought To Be A Law." Now and then he sounds a little like Mose Allison, which is strange. The bed-rock boogie is loosed again on "Tribute To My Father," his pop having woogied the first boogie woogie Alexander ever heard. "The best sellers

Judgement" is more of a contemporary thing, solemn and not much to my liking. The pianist is accompanied by 23-year-old drummer Mickey Durio and 24-year-old bassman Larry Murdo, both of the Whispering Shadows unit, who provide effective support. The album should be enjoyed by those who are knocked out by knocked-out piano. D.A. is a find for Chris Strachwitz. — MAX JONES.

CLEM CLEMPSON is a reluctant star. The ever smiling and talented young lead guitarist with Humble Pie has slotted beautifully into the band since Pierre Framp-ton sailed forth to lead his Camel into pastures new.

But Clem, who lays down one of the funkier guitar sounds in rock, does not have eyes for solo star-dom.

"I think I've got the ideal group situation," he told me this week over a beaker of cocoa.

"There are so many good players around and I can't handle being the front man. I'm really lucky because Steve takes care of that."

There's no doubt Steve Marriott is the explosive bundle of energy that has charged the Pie since their inception back in '68.

Today Steve is singing with more power than ever, and after a couple of years blitzing the States, Pie are now beginning to crack the British market.

But one of the highlights of their current British tour has been the exciting guitar-work of Master Clem, and he is now getting the recognition that he justly deserves.

"It doesn't really work to have a front-line," insists Clem. "You've always got to have one face."

"It didn't really work in Cream when they had a split front line, and that's why we're so happy as a band. We each know our role."

"Stevie accepts his role as front man without letting it go to his head. It doesn't get to the point where he IS the band, because he relies on us as much as we rely on him."

"Steve has tremendous energy, and when we play or record, well it's like a party every night."

"We've been recording in our own studio which is really relaxing. We don't even have an engineer. It's at a place out in Essex — and Dave Gilmour of the Pink Floyd lives nearby, so he drops in once in a while."

What did Clem think of the Blackberries vocal group who joined them on tour?

"Oh, they were amazing. They did the same job for us they did for the Stones."

CLEM CLEMPSON: exciting guitar work

LUCKY PIEMAN

It was really nice having them in the band and when we played the States, we pulled a few more black cats in the audiences who got off on the chicks."

What were the Piemen doing in their hidden country studio by the way?

"We've been working on our next LP for three weeks, and it's nearly finished. Yeah — we do work quickly. We do a couple of tracks a day."

"I've been getting a lot more into slide guitar. It's something I really enjoy. It gives the guitar much more expression. You can wail man!" Clem laughed and took another swig at his Guinness — or cocoa as it is rarely called.

"Steve is improving so much as a guitar player too. Steve's silly. He should be able to play anything with all the experience he's had. He's got the technique but he never puts it to full use. That rhythm guitar thing came about from being with Pete."

"Obviously Pete made him feel he should leave the lead guitar work to him. But that was silly because the days of rhythm and lead guitar are over."

"The trend is to keep the rhythm as loose as possible between the bass and drums, while the two guitars are used as guitars."

"The LP by the way is called 'Thunderbox,' which is a 17th century word for Khasi. It's an old army expression."

"Actually I'd never heard the expression before Steve mentioned it. Greg Ridley is singing a lot more, but there are no changes of direction."

"It's like parts of 'Smokin' and 'Eat It' put together — the raunchiness of 'Smokin' and the lyrics of 'Eat It.' We don't really go in musical directions y'know."

"It's more like a hobby. It's just whatever happens. Some of the things we record are written."

"I have a chord sequence and a bit of a melody I want to use, and Steve writes the words. That's how the tunes turn out on 'Thunderbox.'"

"Jerry Shirley has written a track, Steve and I have written a few. Aside from that it just all happens in the studio."

"We've been using Mel Collins as a brass section by the way. He's a really talented guy, and overdubs the sax parts for us. He had a really good time with us on tour in the States, especially in the Holiday Inn bars."

Would Clem agree there was a lot of gospel content in current Humble Pie music?

"It may sound a strange thing to say, but it's just a stage act, it's a part of our life. We play the music with feeling."

"You'll notice you don't get any black kids at a Yes concert — say. But our music is black music, or music that both black and white people have in common."

"But you can't talk about black and white music really, it's honest music, that's all."

When was Clem going to make a solo album? It would be a treat for music lovers "I aim to stay with the band. I don't really think about the future. I do what I do."

"It's really strange, some people treated my leaving Colosseum to join Humble Pie, as if I had left the Mahavishnu Orchestra to join Sweet."

"I've learnt so much since I joined Pie about being a rock musician. Colosseum couldn't resist the temptation to get far out and it destroyed the spontaneity. Strangely enough Jon (Hiseman) wanted to form a three piece, but I couldn't do it with him then. I wasn't ready. If I'd known what I know now, I could have."

"But a solo LP? That's something I talk about a lot. I don't like singing — in fact I can't sing. If I did one it would have to be apart from Humble Pie, something with other guys."

"I'd really like to do an LP with Cozy Powell. After the Bakerloo band split up I formed a band with Cozy. Then I got a mysterious message from Jon Hiseman."

"I sneaked off to the audition, and Cozy came round to see me. My little brother told him I'd gone to see Jon."

Downing our eight pints of Guinness we staggered from the pub in some haste and bid adieu, until the next time.

MUD: entertainment not education

Bubbling Mud

LES GRAY, lead singer of Mud, has just arrived at Audio International studios, ready to put down the vocal tracks of the group's follow-up to "Dynamite."

It's already being recorded even though "Dynamite" has been out only a month and is still shinning up the Top Twenty. Obviously, these boys don't like to waste time.

And, as a band whose motto might well be "Entertainment, not education," they don't like to waste effort either.

The next single is another song by chart songsmiths Nicky Chinn and Mike Chapman, their fourth for Mud, and is called "Tiger Feet." It will be out in January.

How far do Mud now credit the song-writers with their success?

Sez Les: "I would say the first single was 100 per cent them. But the thing was that we already had an excellent record as far as working ordinary gigs went."

"We had a big following round the country because we'd been about for six years. Our money was up to what a one-hit band would have been asking."

"We always do our best to put on a good show and I hope it's always musically proficient and palatable to the ear. This helped with the subsequent records, and 'Dynamite' is going down tremendously on stage."

However, it all really depended on how professional an act was, especially when there were TV appearances to live up to. Mud accept this challenge with relish.

Les expounds: "Well, it's entertainment, not education. We're quite unashamedly a pop band and to the best of our ability we provide good music for the people who come to see us."

Over the years Mud must have played almost every kind of venue in Britain: colleges, clubs, cabaret, even Batley Variety Club.

Now they're naturally doing the big ballrooms to keep pace with the record fans.

They're proud of their versatility and feel, as entertainers, they should be able to play to different kinds of audiences.

He decried groups in similar positions to Mud who, feeling they'd made it, spurned one audience for another: "We have opportunities to do things we really enjoy doing but you can't over-indulge yourselves — the audience is the prime thing."

"Crazy" was released in America last week and Mud are keeping their fingers crossed on reaction to it, favourable so far, doing by what little they've heard. Johnny Jones from their management team has been to the States to see how best Mud could appear there.

"We weren't really sure whether we were right for the States, with the heavy scene there and the big stadiums. Johnny's discovered though that there is, not a teenybopper scene, but a middle of the road thing for us: the Three Dog Night sort of bracket."

"We'll slip in quietly during the next six months I should think, suss it out first, come away, work it out, and go back and do better once we've learned the secrets."

Paul's plans for the future

WHAT were Paul Kossoff's main influences, what guitars and amplifiers does he use in the studio and is he releasing a solo album in the near future? (Gordon Bearley, Willenhall, Staffs).

What equipment does he use in the studio and on stage, did he have a formal musical education and when did he start playing guitar? On which tracks of "Heartbreaker" did he play and what are his plans for the future? (Volker Kramarz, Bonn, West Germany).

My main influences were Eric Clapton, Jimi Hendrix and Freddie King. I use a Gibson Les Paul guitar with Gibson Somatic medium gauge strings on the 6th, 5th and 4th, a heavy plain 3rd and 2nd and a medium 1st. On stage I use a 300 watt Marshall amplifier and in the studio I use a 100-watt Marshall. I have completed my first solo album for release by Island in November. I had seven years of training from a professor of classical guitar music from the age of nine. It came about when I heard Hank Marvin and decided I wanted to play the instrument myself. So I asked my father if I could have guitar lessons and he sent me for classical training. I began my career when I was 16. I played on the following tracks of Free's "Heartbreaker" LP: "Come Together In The Morning," "Travellin' In Style," "Heartbreaker," "Common Mortal Man," and "Seven Angels." My future plans include the solo album and I hope to form a band in the near future. — PAUL KOSSOFF.

Radio waves

WHAT are the chances of becoming a disc-jockey or an announcer with commercial radio and is there anywhere one can train for such a job? — Christopher Lynn-Evans, Oxford.

A comprehensive course in all aspects of commercial radio, titled Air Training, is being run by Independent Radio Studios, 59 Dean Street, London W1V 5HH. It is not designed simply for aspiring DJs. It covers everything that happens in a radio station. Eight sessions are given twice weekly between 7 and 9 p.m. over a four-week period and the cost is £44.

Main Man

WHO are the members of Man on the cover of their latest LP, "Back Into The Future" and where was the photo taken? — Eileen Hodges, Eastbourne.

The location was the now-disused station on the old Great Western Railway at Taplow (Bucks), between Slough and Reading. Although trains do not stop there any more it is on the main line from Paddington to the West Country and expresses were roaring through during the session. The station still has its quaint old-fashioned appearance and to emphasize this and the title of the album

PAUL KOSSOFF: Clapton influence the boys and their wives and children dressed up to portray a bygone period. Spread left to right when the cover is opened up are Angie (wife of former roadie and sound mixer Plug Davis), bassist Will Yougatt, Plug Davis and his daughter, Tootsie, organist Phil Ryan's daughter Ella, Phil Ryan, Linda Williams (wife of drummer Terry), lead guitarist Mick Jones, Terry Williams, Mick's wife Jennifer, Phil's wife Pam and their son Noel, and road manager Jeff Hooper. On the inside cover the two faces peering from a centre window are guitarist Tweke Lewis and tour manager Phil Foster.

Flute tutor

I HAVE just started learning to play the flute and I have bought an instruction book to teach myself. Although I can sound the notes all right in the first octave I am having difficulty in getting the correct pitch and tone of the notes in the second octave. My flute is a Regent. — John Illingworth, Wakefield.

The Regent flute is a reasonable student instrument and if in good order should not impede your ability to produce a good tone. It's always wise to have lessons from a qualified teacher as initial problems are overcome quickly by personal tuition. For best tonal results use the smile embouchure, which gives the lips elasticity and gets them vibrating nicely. Experimentation for best head position is advisable — when low C is obtained strongly this is a good guide you have the head in the best position. Press the lip plate into the chin under the lower lip — this helps lip vibration and a good vibrating air flow. For lower notes tighten upper lip over upper teeth. For upper overblown notes smile at maximum to make aperture between lips as small as possible, giving a feeling of spitting out a pin head. It helps production of second register notes to practise third register — mastery of this makes for easier normal overblowing. The tone power is produced in the flute head and a good silver head will greatly improve tone. The quality of tone is mainly psychological. With practice, perseverance and patience you will acquire all you desire. — WINSTON INGRAM, Multi-Instrumentalist and teacher, 141 Churchill Road, London NW2.

Birthdays

WHAT equipment is used by the Suzi Quatro band and what are the birthdates of the members? — Nigel Bradley, Stonebroom, Derby.

Suzi Quatro: Born Detroit, Michigan, USA, 3/6/1950. Gibson Les Paul Professional Bass. Fender Precision Bass. Dan Armstrong light-gauge strings. Acoustic 371 amplifier. Len Tuckey: Born Aberdeen, 15/12/1947. Gibson Les Paul Professional. Gibson SG Standard. 1957 Fender Stratocaster. EKO six-string acoustic. Ernie Ball strings. Orange 120-watt amplifier with four 4 x 12 cabinets. Alistair McKenzie: Born Glasgow, 14/8/1947. Hammond L100 organ with Leslie 147. Wurliitzer electric piano. Dave Neal: born Woolwich, London, 24/4/1952. Ludwig Super Clas-

Lemon squash

HOW did Stackridge get their name and where did each member of the band live in his childhood? — P. Wood, Backwell, Somerset.

In its early semi-pro days in Bristol the group was called Stackridge Lemon. Bass guitarist Crun Walter christened it, but cannot remember why he chose the name and as far as he can recall it doesn't mean anything. The Lemon part was dropped at a later stage. Mike Evans and James Warren both spent their childhood in Bristol, Crun Walter in Bath and Andy Davis in the village of Yatton, Somerset. Stackridge have now added two newcomers, Rod Bowkett, who comes from Brighton, and Keith Gemmell, whose home was in London.

Higher tune

I HAVE just purchased a Rickenbacker 450 12-string guitar and have been told by a friend that I should not use a higher tuning than C or else it will put too much strain on the neck. Is it all right to use the normal E tuning or stick to the C tuning and transpose? — A. Olive, Ramsgate.

It is quite in order for the instrument to be tuned to E provided that a light set of strings are used, such as Ernie Ball 12-string slinky or Rickenbacker 484 12-string. The 450 incorporates two truss rods in the neck for tension adjustment, thereby giving a great durability to the neck. The only time it would be necessary to detune the instrument would be if you were using a medium or heavy gauge string set, which would put great tension on the neck if tuned to E. — CRAIG BRADLEY, Top Gear, 5 Denmark Street, London WC2, exclusive distributors of Rickenbacker guitars and strings in the UK.

ALVIN LEE AND MYLON LE FEVRE: second chances

Mylon lives—thanks to Alvin Lee

If Mylon Le Fevre never does another thing (which is unlikely) then he'll have done sufficient in liberating the musician that's been hiding inside Alvin Lee.

If Alvin Lee never does another thing (also unlikely) then he'll have done sufficient in saving Mylon Le Fevre's life, which the white gospel singer clearly believes has happened.

Mylon was a drug addict. A heavy habit, the result of two years solid work on the road. Alvin took him off the road and kept him away from the pushers.

Here in the dark control room of Lee's Woodcote recording studio the bond is easy to see—you can almost touch it. Two men who, with a little help from their friends, have produced an album, "On The Road To Freedom," that's really something of a milestone for both of them.

The studio, in a converted barn, is an odd mixture of old beam and modern console. Lee—denims and white clogs—paces round the control booth.

There've been two people, besides Lee, that've believed in Mylon Le Fevre. One was his record producer, Allen Toussaint; the other was his manager and mentor Felix Pappalardi. Both were going to produce the album. Both were prevented by prior contractual commitments.

Mylon's been playing a long time; playing round the South, his homeland. He can remember seeing the Allman Brothers Band as recently as three years ago playing a high school prom for $200 on a Saturday night.

"Me 'n' Duane Allman used to sit in a bar and dream about the day we'd have enough money for a motorcycle. He was making $85 a week."

Georgia music is the thing that binds Lee and Mylon together. Le Fevre's lived it; Alvin was first inspired by his father's 78s of it.

Pappalardi discovered Mylon in a gospel group. Le Fevre had short hair, wore a suit and tie and was also playing bass in Nashville on country sessions. "This gospel group wouldn't let me put out all mah songs 'cos it was getting a bit... y'know, bin high for 'bout ten or 11 years."

Elvis, Johnny Cash and Merle Haggard were doing his songs, but he wasn't able to do any of his own material himself.

"I was having these dreams and I wanted the songs to sound like the dreams, and the only way to do that was do 'em mahself." The Southern drawl is deep; it cracks occasionally, but it's as smooth as julep syrup.

"So I went to this pop festival in Macon, Georgia. Mountain was playin' there. I went on mah motorcycle and I took some acid. I was jus' tippin' mah brains out. I climbed over the fence backstage and I was just gawkin' around all the rock 'n' roll stars—y'know?—thinkin' 'Boy, really would like to do that gig instead of havin' ta do all this session stuff."

"I met ole Felix. Didn't know who he was, just knew he was pickin' cos of the way he looked."

They talked, and after the gig Mylon went into the Mountain trailer where Terry Reid and Corky Laing were sitting playing and he played them some of his gospel tunes. Felix thought he'd like to back the boy.

"So 'bout ten days from that day he bought a church and about $40,000 worth of amps and sent all the money to hire the people. I got this band together. We didn't even know each other's names and we was on the road together."

The first gig was in Burlington, Vermont, opening the tour for Traffic.

"We had made this album on 8-track tape in the middle of the night by splicing a huge tape and piecing it together. It was really chicken-wired together, mah first album, anybody that'd play free."

So they hit the road: "Twenty-one thousand people that first night, scared me to death."

by
Geoff Brown

Mylon was, he says, the first white guy Toussaint ever produced. "He didn't know I was white. Allen heard me and thought I was black, I guess, so he produced me."

That was about 4½ years ago. Mylon had one Atlantic and two Columbia albums released and did gigs and sessions with loads more.

Mylon was on the road for 2½ years during which time they had 91 days off. "I'd come off the road with Ten Years After and go with the Tull and the Who and Traffic."

In all he did four tours with TYA: "And during that time Alvin saw me gettin' sick and he said 'Let's just take two weeks off and go to Jamaica.' So we just quit then and got this house and schemed up all these high fliers. Everything that we decided we was gonna do man, we've done."

"I junked out. I just quit in March two years ago. I was in bad shape. I was just a country boy and I went off to the big city, man, and I ran into drugs. I didn't know nothin' about gettin' into trouble. I just quit for mah mental health, I just couldn't handle it anymore. I couldn't get away from the people, y'know?"

"When you're a drug addict the only people you can trust are drug addicts. People can put you in jail for a long time. I mean heroin's somethin' that people are really down on and they oughta be. I almost died from it. It's the sneakiest thing in the world and you think you got it under control and you try to quit and it's impossible."

"I came over here and Alvin hid me out here in his house in the country and there was just no place to score and everybody was up and cookin' and doin' things. It was really just a good atmosphere."

He stayed for three months. When Lee, Leo Lyons and some others went down to do some tapes at Roger Daltrey's studios Mylon went with them. They took a bunch of their songs written in Jamaica.

"That let us know we could do it," says Mylon, and besides, Pete Townshend and Steve Winwood had both offered their studios. Everyone Mylon had supported in the States was eager for him to get straight and get playing.

The Daltrey tapes lit the spark. Lee's studios were being built "Mylon came over to record the album and ended up labouring to build the studios."

The whole album was recorded while they were still being built so although they think the music on the album's great, the production could be bettered now that the studios are completed. Recording the album was a stone joy, they say.

"We tried to get up before sundown," says Mylon, "have a swim or ride the motorcycles through the woods—somethin' to get some air inside of us. We'd come in here 'bout dark. We'd go on 'til about 4p.m. next afternoon thinkin' it was still dark. We've been up two days doin' things in here and George (Harrison) would be asleep for two days and he'd come over. He'd be ready and rarin' to go and we'd get into it again. We'd do 50 hours in here."

Now that they've done the album Mylon and Alvin are both looking forward to doing another. There's plenty of material left but, says Mylon, they'll be going to Jamaica again to write fresh songs and they're working out ways to get the album on the road.

After his drug problems he's feeling reborn: "Addiction is a sickness man. But because you can't be honest with yourself when you're that stoned you believe the things you're thinking. You go on lying to yourself and to other people, but Alvin stuck beside me and just cared."

Mylon got a second chance. The album, in another way, has given Alvin Lee a second chance too. A musical one. As one who's been completely unimpressed with TYA it's a revelation and a delight to hear that Lee knows the importance of taste and space in soloing.

Alvin knows it's done him proud too. That's why he's pacing the control room like a caged tiger. He's got the creative hots. Mylon says it's done Lee good to get out and jam—the strictures of TYA were too choking.

The Naked Truth

Honestly, my skin looks like an orange... shiny, full of tiny holes which makeup doesn't hide. What can I do about it?
Keep it clean! Not just on the surface but also deep down inside the pores. That shine tells that the oil glands are over-active. The 'holes' are pores that have got choked with their own secretion from inside, and with makeup from the outside. First you must clear away the clogging matter, next keep the pores clear so that they can contract and your skin regains its normal, finer texture. To do this you need a super-fine emulsified lotion—'Anne French' Deep Cleansing Milk—which melts away makeup at a touch. At the same time it searches down into the pores, and beats away all impurities. Use 'Anne French' regularly twice a day and see what a difference it makes.

Show a Leg

I like mini-skirts but I'm a brunette and I find the hair on my legs rather spoils the effect. Do you recommend shaving them?
Dark hairs certainly do look unattractive and I find the quickest and easiest way of keeping legs silky smooth is to use 'Animae' Hair Remover. Just smooth it on, leave for a few minutes and then rinse off. The unwanted hair simply dissolves away. 'Animae' is pleasantly perfumed and it's so safe you can even use it on the face. The new 'Animae' Lotion is ideal for legs—very economical, too.

Dryness is Ageing

My complexion has lost its youthful freshness and it getting very lined, perhaps because it is cold. What can I do?
A dry skin certainly is 'ageing'. What you must do is to make good the lack of oil and moisture which is causing the trouble. Simply cleanse your face every night with 'Anne French' Moisture Cream Cleanser—the wonderful new all-in-one conditioning treatment. Not only does this soft, fragrant cream deep cleanse, it also feeds in fresh moisture and protective, emollient oils leaving the skin soft, supple and young-looking.

For free advice on any of your beauty problems, write to Anne French, Dept. 47, 11 Chiswick Street, London, W2 1ET. (Trade Mark)

Berlin fest

B. B. KING: blew it

The late show was for me the low of the festival. Woody Herman's Thundering Herd were thunderously boring and unadventurous, having much in common with the precision of a military manoeuvre, and not too much in common with heart-felt music.

Wooden in the extreme, they fouled up Coltrane's "Giant Steps" with a very ham-fisted arrangement, similarly Chick Corea's "La Fiesta," and Herman's own playing is simply not suited to that sort of material.

Herbolzheimer's Rhythm Combination and Brass was only slightly more acceptable. They at least have retained some roughness and attack, but ultimately their hakeneyed big band melodrama was equally superficial, although guest John Faddis had a few good moments up front, playing tasty trumpet.

Speeding from the Philharmonic to the Quartier Latin, I caught the tail end of a fine set by the Christmann-Schonenberg Duo — Gunter Christmann on trombone, and Detlef Schonenberg on drums.

Part of their strength is that they tend to play short pieces, making things easier for the casual listener.

Certainly they were well appreciated.

Sunday

THREE concerts, morning, afternoon and evening. The first was simply a repeat of the previous day's Jarrett/Farrrell / Townner concert.

It was unusual in that none of the artists wanted to play it originally, yet when it came to the crunch all played better sets than the night before.

Jarrett particularly was superb this time. He had only twenty minutes in which to play, due to a pre-arranged plane flight and a gig waiting elsewhere, but that twenty minutes was full of strong concentrated group inter-action, and Franco, having reduced his personal percussive artillery to a dozen effects, was in perfect sympathy with the other musicians.

The afternoon concert began with the Second Generation: Gary Burton (vibes), Joe Henderson (tenor), Jimmy Owens (trumpet), Cedar Walton (piano), Larry Ridley (bass), and Roy Haynes (drums).

Theirs was a most uninspired performance, I thought, only Haynes playing with any real fire, and Burton's vibes seemed particularly redundant, being only rarely audible. The rest was just a collection of comfortable, adequate solos.

Unfortunately, he blew it at the end with a sick-making oratory about "you wonderful people of Berlin who have taken us to your hearts." It was ingratiating in the extreme.

Later at the Quartier, which had become a sort of home-from-home, I enjoyed a performance by Swiss lady avant-garde pianist Irene Schweitzer, with Makaya Nishoku on drums.

Irene looks a very serious, studious chick, with large glasses and a mouth set tense, but her music was as emotionally involving as any I heard in four days and four nights in Berlin.

It'd be more than nice to see her in a concert setting at next year's festival.

The Muhl Richard Abrams Sextet from AACM, Chicago was something else altogether. In fact, the most exhilarating music of the festival.

Now this band really took some chances, inviting audience heckling by beginning very quietly with drummer Steve McCall playing marimba, while alto and baritone player Wallace McMillan performed a stage homage to Africa mime dance and alto and tenor man Henry Threadgill struck finger-cymbals.

After some fifteen minutes of this, the crowd clearly had them registered as a bunch of poseurs, but minds were changed when Richard Abrams, face daubed with war-paint, sat down at the piano, and Kala Parusha (formerly Maurice McIntyre) and Reggie Willis moved to their instruments, tenor and bass respectively.

Suddenly they tore into a jump band theme, all three saxen in unison at first, and then weaving and bobbing around each other, taking the music eventually into a very free area, everyone soloing both a cappella and within the group structures, and Abrams' assault on the piano was truly staggering. His hands disappearing in a blur as he raced percussively up, down and all over the keyboard.

Kahsan Roland Kirk and the Vibration Society couldn't help but be a bring-down after the AACM mob. Live, Kirk was more tolerable than on recent recordings, but even so, seemed short on new ideas.

His use of two and three horns simultaneously, is, was and always will be impressive, ditto the sheer length of his solos, but technique alone is really a poor alternative for substance.

The evening show, the last of the official festival, showcased the talents of B. B. King, who also hosted the all-blues programme. Guest artists were Eddie Vinson, honking an alto and singing dirty songs, and Odetta, a lady with amazing tonsils.

Both got huge ovations, but more so Odetta, who charmed by doing everything wrong — guitar out of tune, broken strings etc.

Finally she dropped the instrument and sang unaccompanied. Applause was so great that the King band had difficulty in getting back on stage.

"Yeah, yeah. We love her too," said Riley B. grudgingly. The rest of the night was just King at his best — uniquely emotional guitar, never relying on dexterity or flash, keeping it simple and meaningful.

Unfortunately, he blew it at the end with a sick-making oratory about "you wonderful people of Berlin who have taken us to your hearts." It was ingratiating in the extreme.

Later at the Quartier, which had become a sort of home-from-home, I enjoyed a performance by Swiss lady avant-garde pianist Irene Schweitzer, with Makaya Nishoku on drums.

Corea—not such Bliss

CHICK COREA: "Bliss!" Turkish Woman At The Baths; Dancing Girls; Love Planet; Marjourn; Bliss; Sin Street; And So (Muse Records MUSE 5011).

Chick Corea (piano), John Gilmore (tenor), Walter Booker (bass), Pete LaRoca (drums). 25/5/67.

BIT cheeky, this one. The words "Chick Corea" are writ large across the front, and there's a nice latter-day shot of a hirsute Chick with his 1970 gold-rim specs on.

Trouble is, though, not only is it not a latter-day Chick Corea album, it's not a Chick Corea album.

Careful reading of the small print on the reverse of the sleeve reveals that these tracks were contracted under drummer LaRoca's name, and in fact he wrote all of the tracks here, and very fine they are too.

Corea is only an equal quarter of the band, although his cohesive group-sense is interesting to compare with the roughly contemporary "Tones For Joan's Bones", his first date as a leader.

But it's actually LaRoca who grabs the ear the most, especially on "Dancing Girls" where he plays what are either timbales or brilliantly executed snare rimshots against Corea's two-fisted pummeling.

Interesting, because it's almost an exchange of rhythmic roles, Corea holding down a pulse while LaRoca embellishes it, taking the drums into the front line.

Gilmore is beautiful throughout. It's as though the word "authority" was invented to describe his broad tone, and he's especially dogmatic on "Sin Street."

Chick's great on this cut, too, as with a very precise sense of timing he duets with the thrashing LaRoca, before the drummer moves into a forceful solo feature.

Not much to say about Booker, really. He's strong and dependable and funky on the closer "And So" which recalls Keith Jarrett's "Is It Really The Same", but he's not as individual a voice as the other three musicians.

Corea, of course, was still formulating his style at this stage, but that ought to make this album worthwhile listening for Return To Forever fans.

I don't think he's ever equalled the work he did on the ECM Circle album, personally — S.L.

This album should be available at any of the London jazz specialists, but if you have difficulty, write to Muse Records, Blanchris Inc., 160 West 71st Street, New York, N.Y. 10023.

PIANO ANTHOLOGY

"A JAZZ PIANO ANTHOLOGY." Record One — Eubie Blake: Sound Of Africa; James P. Johnson: Keep Off The Grass; Fats Waller: Muscle Shoals Blues; Jimmy Yancey: Bear Trap Blues; Bix Beiderbecke: In A Mist; Earl Hines: 57 Varieties; Joe Sullivan: Honeysuckle Rose; Jess Stacey: The World Is Waiting For The Sunrise; Art Tatum: Tiger Rag; Teddy Wilson: Liza; Albert Ammons: Meade Lux Lewis: Boogie Woogie Prayer; Mary Lou Williams: Little Joe From Chicago; Mel Powell: For Miss Black; Count Basie: Way Back Blues; Duke Ellington: Yearning For Love. Record Two — Thelonious Monk: Round Midnight; Bud Powell: Thelonious; Erroll Garner: Indiana; Hank Jones, Poika Dots And Moonbeams; Dave Brubeck: In Your Own Sweet Way; John Lewis: Silver; Horace Silver: Silver's Blue (an excerpt); Ahmad Jamal: Billy Boy; Red Garland: Billy Boy; Ray Bryant: Pawn Ticket; Dave McKenna: Splendid Splinter; Bill Evans: The Two Lonely People (Columbia double import album KG 32355).

THE development of jazz piano can be loosely charted with the help of this two-LP set, which originated with Henri Renaud and CBS of Paris, even though a few important practitioners — Jelly Roll Morton prominent among them — are missing from it.

Record One, exemplifies unaccompanied solo styles of ragtime, stride and blues players, beginning with Eubie Blake's virtuoso jazz-ragtime performance of his own highly attractive "Sound Of Africa."

He is followed by another Harlem stride master James P. Johnson, whose "early" "Keep Off The Grass" is a brilliant and complex piece of rag-influenced jazz playing. Then the four-square decorative blues piano, still rag-influenced, of Fats Waller is heard.

Next comes the marvellously distinctive and sensuous Chicago slow blues of Jimmy Yancey on "Bear Trap," not one of his best recordings but interesting and moving as always. The title derives from a South Side tonk of the prohibition era.

Beiderbecke's piano was about as imaginative as his cornet, and this "In A Mist" solo from the 'twenties appeals for the quality of the composition rather than the playing.

Hines, who follows, plays his own "57 Varieties" with remarkable attack and rhythmic proficiency. This 1928 piece owes something to ragtime still but is pure jazz — Hines "trumpet style" more than New Orleans or Chicago style.

Out of Hines and Waller and various styles current in the Chicago jazz of the 'twenties came the hard-swinging piano of Joe Sullivan, a man with obvious roots in ragtime and the boogie type of piano work.

Stacey's "World Is Waiting," which has barrelhouse drumming to emphasise the gimball nature of the keyboard approach, is, like Sullivan's "Honeysuckle," a classic of 'thirties piano jazz.

Side Two features Tatum's over-busy "Tiger Rag" from his first record dates. Pianistically superb it nevertheless has less to say than many of his later efforts. Wilson's disciplined and clear-swinging "Liza" makes an impressive contrast.

Then in succession we get a three-pianist job on "Boogie Woogie Prayer" — experimental for its time and reasonably successful because of its rhythmic drive and the mutual sympathy shown by Messrs Ammons, Johnson and Lewis — a boogie-styled "Little Joe" by the relatively sophisticated Mary Lou Williams, and Clarence Profitt's harmonically adventurous "I Didn't Know What Time."

Now we are moving into the realms of more "modern" piano, though the older idioms are still well in evidence. Mel Powell's "Miss Black" swings strongly and pays dues to the techniques of Hines, Wilson, Waller and Tatum.

As for Basie, his sound and spacious timing and dependence on a rhythm section hint at many things then to come — even Monk. And so the first (mono) record ends with Ellington, always the modernist, displaying plenty of stomping feeling in an extremely individual discourse between piano, bass and drums.

The pointers to Monk's mode of expression lead to the man himself on "Midnight" and Bud Powell's satisfying "Thelonious." After those, Garner comes on with his easily accessible and timeless style: bright, dynamic, firm-swinging.

Next Hank Jones's handsome ballading; Brubeck playing Brubeck on the well-written, somewhat rambling "In Your Own Sweet Way." John Lewis soloing concisely against jazz rhythm and, at times, heavy orchestra; and a short, relaxed passage of blues by Horace Silver.

By now we are with stereo and, for the most part, rhythm teams. Jamal exhibits a new manner for fifties playing, reminiscent of Garner in his use of certain devices, and a stylistic continuation is suggested by featuring Red Garland on the same tune, "Billy Boy."

On to the admirable and funky Ray Bryant, then (surprisingly perhaps) Dave McKenna and, naturally enough, the thoughtful Bill Evans before this essay in piano-jazz evolution improvisations of Cecil Taylor.

The sleeve note is interesting but why no recording dates? — M.J.

JAZZSCENE

Come on and stomp! MAX JONES hits the road in search of the Great Trad Revival. This week: Liverpool

THERE'S something stirring down in the grassroots of traditional jazz, the editor assured me. Or rather up in the grassroots, as most of what he felt was happening was happening above the Midlands line. A mini-revival it was.

"You'd better hit the road and look into the situation in the pubs and clubs of Liverpool, Manchester and other big centres," he said. "I'd like you to start at once."

Thus I found myself at Euston Station on Tuesday last week, armed with reporter's survival kit and aimed for that great port in the north-west situated some 200 miles from what I tend to regard as civilisation.

Before leaving, though, I called upon George Melly — the noted Liverpoolian — for an informal briefing.

"We feel," I opened cautiously, "there's a bit of a revival of tradjazz in the pubs up north. Do you agree?"

He smiled inscrutably. "It isn't a revival and it isn't exactly trad. And it isn't at all restricted to the pubs." The emphasis mounted each time he uttered the word "isn't." He paused and the smile broadened appreciably. "Otherwise you're absolutely correct."

Still, he reckoned I might as well start with Liverpool. "I could hear the Merseys at least, and go and see where the Cavern, which used to be a jazz club, used to be before they pulled it down or filled it in or whatever."

My other instant adviser was Steve Voce, jazz scholar and doubtless gentleman, who broadcasts twice weekly from BBC's Merseyside station and is a local luminary — at any rate he helps people get lit up.

"What brings you to this misbegotten city of ours?" he asked. He knew, since I'd telephoned ahead, but it was a nice leading question.

"It's a sort of Max Hits The Road. I'm doing a type of Kinsey Report on the habits and jazz customs of the natives, also the taste of the beer."

"Get your hand off me leg," he said peremptorily. As the conversation was being relayed live over Radio Merseyside I was fractionally surprised. However, it was that kind of programme.

Voce had promised to ferry me about to the right pubs and restaurants and I had promised to disrupt his Wednesday jazz programme. I expect he got the worst of the bargain.

The Mersey beat

Anyway, on Tuesday evening he steered us to the Coffee House pub out in Wavertree where the Blue Magnolia Jazz orchestra normally holds sway each week. As it turned out, they were missing. In place of them I heard the Panama Jazz Band, another group of fairly fundamental traditionalists who remain faithful to the revivalist style.

The Coffee House is on the fundamental side, too. A "real" pub serving Tetley's beers in exceptionally unglamorous surroundings, it was short of bartenders and glasses but not of customers. On the stand, with a simple PA system to help vocals and announcements, the Panama brigade lined up as follows:

Dave Renton (trombone), Keith Jones (clarinet), John Critchley (trumpet), Terry Burstall (piano), Dave Wright (banjo), Robin Tankard (bass) and Bill Williams (drums). Williams said he was "loosely the leader." He and Dave Renton did some of the singing I heard.

As I understood it, Critchley had come over from the Blue Magnolias, a band which used to include Ken Sims in that post (he is now back in London).

The Panama men play regularly on Wednesdays at the Black Horse in West Kirby, over the water, where they are in their ninth year. Like all the Liverpool trad bands it is semi-pro.

Had arrangements gone differently, I should have caught the Blue Magnolias on Tuesday, and the Merseyside Jazz Band and Panama Jazz Band on Wednesday. As it was, I had to miss the Magnolias.

After an enthusiastically played set which took in a bit of everything traditional and claimed attention more for ensemble feeling than solo finesse, the Panama band was joined by trumpeter Tommy Smith for "Royal Garden Blues" and "Struttin' With Some Barbecue." He was even given smartly played tuba accompaniment.

His face was a face familiar from London — I'd met him once playing valve trombone with Mick Mulligan, T.S., as he is known, has been a pro for 30 years. He lives from theatre work and such, plays French horn and string bass as well as trumpet, and does summer seasons with Joe Loss. Recently he took his own band to Miami.

The following evening brought me face to face with the Mersey men, a band I had known since 1949 and always thought of as representing Liverpool revival music with a two-trumpet, vaguely Lu Watters flavour. The remaining old faces looked much as I remember them: just a little older and more respectable.

Their Wednesday home is a sprausny new-look hostelry, the Sportsman, decorated with racing cars and other sporting paraphenalia and containing bars with sporty names. The MJB performs in the Grand National bar. The beer is Greenall Whitley and this night it flowed like, well, water.

On this occasion the band had Bert Lambe, a busy ragtime pianist, in place of Frank Robinson. The rest of the personnel were John Lawrence (cornet), John Higham (trumpet), John Parkes (trombone), Don Lydiatt (clarinet), Ken Baldwin (guitar and banjo), Derek Vaux (electric bass), and Mike McCoombe (drums).

As Tommy Smith was sitting-in, the brass team fluctuated between three and four. For this reason, and because the final set is largely a vocal one, I wasn't hearing the band's root style.

And there were moments when the three trumpets seemed to be pulling in three directions at once. No matter, it was lively and irreverent stuff which finally captured the attention of all but the glassiest chicks when Jill Martin did the vocal duties on "After You've Gone," "Nobody Knows You," "Blues My Naughty Sweetie" and "Ain't Misbehavin'."

She is a bluesy, deep-voiced, fairly dangerous looking blonde who is liable to soup up the lyrics with such variations as "Nobody knows you when it's hanging out."

Earlier Wednesday, at 1 pm, had been meeting time in the Captain's Cabin of the New Court boozery.

There, Tommy Smith — who was guiding me by day — and Bill Williams of the Panama plus several of the Merseysidians talked of the Liverpool blowing scene, past and present, and there was chat about healthier jazz times when the MJB had residencies at the Cavern followed by the Mardi Gras club.

The New Court holds regular Sunday evening sessions with a quartet led by clarinettist John Stringer, who has played in the Merseyside band, also Sunday lunchtime bashes by a pick-up group at the Grand Hotel, New Brighton. There are lunchtime jams, too, every other Sunday at the Grand Hotel, New Brighton.

Otherwise, the pub picture amounts to this: one evening a week at the Black Horse (by the Panama on Wednesday), another one a week by the PJB at the Victoria Hotel (on Thursday), one at the Coffee House (by the Blue Magnolia band on Tuesday), one a week at the Sportsman (by the MJB on Wednesday), one at the Dove and Olive in Speke (by the Savoy Jazzmen, formed more than a dozen years ago, on Tuesday), one at the Metro Club (by the Phoenix Jazz Band on Thursday), one more on Thursday by the Magnolia Band at the Star and Garter.

And mention was made of New Orleans jazz by the Ray Hayes band at the Grange Hotel, Moreton, on Sundays.

It is almost entirely a pub scene and a free (non-paying) situation which clearly does not bring the bands any substantial money. However, some say they are earning more than they used to, outside the city, especially since the regular weekly sessions enable them to be more choosy. The Banyan Tree Club, in the basement of the Adelphi Hotel, features modern jazz on Mondays and imports out-of-town talent. I gather from my enquiries that traditional-minded jazz lovers hardly ever patronised it.

A hopeful development in the interest shown by the Merseyside Arts Association which publicises jazz events.

Also there are Monday sessions by the 17-piece Merseyside Big Band at the Victoria Hotel and jazz appreciation meetings on Tuesdays by the Formby Jazz Society. And this year has seen the establishment of Liverpool's own Jazzocracy magazine compiled by Sheila Watson.

My last port of call was to see this same Sheila, who used to run the Merseyside Jazz Society and today partners record man Mike Roberts in Orpheus Productions.

Among other fairly forceful opinions she advanced the view that a jazz scene came down to people, that often those with premises or bureaucratic power were "a bit intolerant towards the music," and potential supporters were hard to attract to any one place in sufficient numbers.

"Liverpool is a large rambling place and it's difficult to get about without a car, especially late at night. And when there's trouble on the buses, you know, they get taken off."

"I do believe there is a small upsurge of interest in jazz, especially in the pubs, though it's by no means a boom. But the club and concert scene is not flourishing. I often wonder where all the people who used to turn up to the Merseyside Jazz Society meetings have gone to."

Without presuming to sum up the Liverpool jazz situation from the results of a short visit, I feel it safe to conclude that jazz is fighting back after being badly hit by the rock revolution but lacking the solid following to support either a jazz night club or ordinary jazz club meetings several times a week.

Perhaps if a name band or a big jazz personality were to appear at the same venue each week it would provide a kind of focal point for the enthusiasm as does exist.

FOLK

DALLAS

IT'S a far from original thought, I know, but really the singer-songwriter thing has a lot to answer for. I'm not thinking about the introspective nature of a lot of their writing, because often the extrovert pose of a lot of other singers can be just as much of a cop-out. It sometimes takes a lot more courage to write a perceptive lyric about your own shortcomings than to rip off an impassioned piece about the men behind the wire — more difficult, too, judging by the number of songwriters who just can't pull it off.

What I'm thinking about, really, is the way the business has made the category a straitjacket, confining the artist as much as it liberates him. Because it was, initially, a liberation.

There was a time, remember, when the idea of people writing their own songs was just plain ridiculous. Performers were performers, who made the best of what the professional hacks of Tin Pan Alley gave them to sing. The idea that the song should actually mean something to the artist, that he could actually use it as a means of communicating something a bit more substantial than a sentimentalised, unerotic kind of love, was really revolutionary.

Then suddenly, as record companies got more powerful and began to see the advantages of having their own publishing subsidiaries, it became a completely different scene.

The other thing the singer-songwriter syndrome has done is to deprive us of a lot of excellent instrumental music.

For example, take Gordon Giltrap. As the lyrics of one of the songs on his excellent new album puts it, he's not really a poet, though occasionally, and probably by accident, he stumbles upon a felicitous turn of phrase that tends to stick in the mind. Nor is his singing anything remarkable though, strangely, I preferred it when he was less assured, more feeling his way into singing, when all he wanted to be was the guv'nor acoustic guitarist of all time, and record companies were urging him to write and sing.

Well, at last it looks as if he may be getting the opportunity. His next album after this one is going to be instrumental, with one side devoted to a guitar concerto that he's already three-quarters of the way through.

A guitar concerto? That's what the man said.

Encouraged by such disparate friends as Derek Brimstone and early English musician Rod Skeaping, he's been getting down the bare bones of something which may be the folk-rock-classical hybrid that so many people have been edging towards in recent years, from Deep Purple to Shirley and Dolly Collins.

"I'm still playing steel-guitar," he says, "but I'm definitely going in a classical direction. I think I had leanings towards that from the word go, from the first LP six years ago.

"The technique isn't classical. That's probably where a lot of classical guitar players will probably spew up and say 'He's playing with a flat pick for a start and the technique's completely wrong'. But I don't care, as long as the sound's right.

"You know, whenever I made an album before, they'd say 'Oh look, doing an instrumental album's not on, because it won't sell, you're not that known. We want a singer-songwriter.'

"But everyone's a singer-songwriter. Not everybody's an accomplished musician. I'm pleased to say that I think I am to a degree, and that's why I'm still making a living. "As you know, I've never been a great songwriter. I think I'm a good singer, but the way I can express myself is through the guitar.

"The concerto is a very melodic thing, very disciplined. I think I'm beginning to create music that might last some time. If I can create something that can disturb people in the same way as Elgar did, you know I'd be very happy. I think it's possible.

"I've got three basic movements that are already done and Rod Skeaping is going to arrange it. It'll be for guitar and early instruments, a kind of small consort of viols and woodwind, classical with a contemporary feel.

"What I've written will probably be changed a bit. These things do. But I'm very excited about it. This is, I think, the thing that's really going to get me the recognition I've wanted, kind of spotlight my guitar playing.

"Because that is the way I can express myself."

Currently Gordon Giltrap is doing an interesting mix of work divided between folk clubs, colleges and tours — the sort of things he has done in the past with heavy bands like Wishbone Ash, Stackridge and Caravan. In a few weeks' time he shares the bill with 10 C.C. — "of all people," as he put it.

"I haven't really been in the business all that long, about six or seven years, but I do know a lot of people. You know, if I've got an album out, I just take it round and play it to them. I don't need a record company or a manager to do that. Why do it on an impersonal level?

"Let's face it, the folk scene is on a very personal level. You can't be all show-bizzy and official with folk club organisers, saying 'this is my fee, either you can afford it or you can't.' They say, 'well, this is only a small club, we can only afford that, because we can only get 100 into our little upstairs pub room."

"So you drop down. That's probably why Martin Carthy is a favourite in the clubs. He charges a reasonable fee so he gets a lot of work. That's realistic.

"I really need to work. I thrive on it. If I don't gig for two weeks, when I get to a club I just go to pieces because I'm so introverted. I might be able to play O.K. but the more gigs I do, the better my playing gets, the more I can project, it's just a necessity."

There are some who would deny Gordon's right to call himself a folk artist, though he is certainly a folk club stalwart among those clubs who appreciate contemporary music and dazzling guitar playing. But to see him on the bill with the heavy bands, is to realise that there is a power within him which makes him one of our growing band of one man rock 'n' roll bands, along with Roy Harper, the master, John Martyn and Mike Chapman.

"I feel that I'm not a folkie, never have been, never will be," he says.

"I'm a rock-classical acoustic guitar player, that's what I am, and I think I can adapt to an audience and turn the kids on as much as the heavy bands.

"I virtually do what the heavy bands are doing, but just on my own. I have played electric guitar, but really I'm acoustic. I couldn't do that one-man Pink Floyd thing like John Martyn and his Echoplex. I'm not into that. For a start, people would start saying 'oh, he's trying to do a John Martyn on us'.

"You know, you gotta be yourself, John's gone in that direction and good luck to him. But I think I've become more of a purist actually. I've been playing acoustic guitar from the word go, virtually, and you learn to get something out of it."

FOLK

A NEW series of film- and - song programmes on BBC-2 TV starts on Friday, November 30, with "Here Come the Brummies," featuring the Ian Campbell Folk Group, in which the Campbells sing specially composed songs about life in the city, illustrated by cameraman John Else.

The series, under the general title of "The Camera And The Song," follows the success of the programme featuring the songs of Alex Glasgow, "The Tyne Slides By," originally transmitted last July and to be repeated at the end of the series in January.

Producer John Bird said: "Seven of the BBC's top film cameramen and seven of Britain's leading singer-song-writers have combined their talents and experience to make this series of musical documentary ballads.

"The singers do not appear in vision, their songs are interpreted entirely by the images of their subject provided by the cameramen. No word of commentary appears — song, music and picture tell all."

Other programmes in the series feature the songs of Ralph McTell (December 7), Jeremy Taylor (14), David Campbell (21), Jake Thackray (28), Max Boyce (January 4) and Alex Glasgow (11).

Russ Henderson and his West Indian band are also featured in the programme on December 21, which centres on the immigrant community of Moss Side, Manchester.

Meanwhile, the highly successful "Ballad of the North West" on BBC-1 (NW only) is to be continued in the middle of next year with a further 14 programmes in addition to the original seven.

"There will be a number of differences in the format," says producer Douglas Boyd, "but basically the idea remains unchanged: a platform for regional folk groups performing local folk material within scripts written by our very own folk music addicts, some of whom are showing pleasantly surprising talents in this direction."

Boyd says that he is still on the lookout for new writers and groups who might fit into the programme's format. He can be reached at Broadcasting House in Manchester.

John Prine is coming back to Britain in December, but so far no further details of his plans are available.

Anyone who visits Collets Record Shop in New Oxford Street, one of the capital's favourite daytime folk haunts, and finds it closed with the builders in, shouldn't worry that it is shut for good. After structural alterations have been completed, the shop will re-open with the same staff and record stock.

Magna Carta, with new member Dave Barker replacing Stan Gordon, start a tour with Hudson Ford at the City Hall, Newcastle-upon-Tyne on November 15. A new single,

IAN CAMPBELL GROUP: TV series

"Give Me Love," was released on Vertigo this week.

Other dates on the tour include Apollo, Glasgow (November 19), Usher Hall, Edinburgh (20), Winter Gardens, Bournemouth (24), Hippodrome, Bristol (25), Opera House, Manchester (29) and Town Hall, Birmingham (30).

Ace American instrumentalist Marc Sullivan, who was one of the pillars of the Soho Cousins scene in the late Sixties, is alive and well and living in London with his wife and new baby, and will be appearing in a solo concert at Hammersmith Town Hall on December 7.

Amazing Blondel, now a duo featuring Eddie Baird and Terry Wincott, kicked off their autumn tour at the Shaw Theatre on Sunday to coincide with the release of their latest album, "Blondel," on Island.

On Friday they are at the Penthouse Club, Scarborough. Saturday, Manchester University, followed by City Polytechnic, London (November 13), Lanchester Polytechnic (17), Middlesex St. George College, Teesside (18), Cat's Whiskers, Burnley (19), Tricorn, Portsmouth (21), Bradford University (24) and Hatfield Polytechnic (30).

The entire Copper Family, Bob, Ron, John and Jill, turn out for the seventh birthday of the Star folk club, Guildford on Friday next week, November 16. This Friday they have Donegal singer and guv'nor whistler-player Packie Byrne and other future guests include Derek and Dorothy Elliott (November 23), Dave Burland (December 7), Alastair Anderson (14), and Ken Loveless (21).

Veteran country artist Hank Snow is in the middle of a British tour which started last week in Gloucester. Tonight (Thursday) he is at the Granada, Sutton, on Friday at the ABC, Hull, and Saturday at the Theatre Royal, Nottingham.

fine music in its day. Now I've reconsidered. McGuinn now seems more like a John Mayall figure, who surrounded himself with good musicians in order to put over the music successfully. On his own, he's lost.

Missing were the two essential ingredients that packed a punch into those songs: the vocal harmonies and the singing guitars which were always the Byrds' trademark. McGuinn was singing on his own (the bass player had a mike and opened his mouth but I couldn't hear him) and he's no great shakes on guitar. His solos, in the main, were a catastrophe.

That he's living on his former glories was more than obvious. How much better it would have been if he'd just presented his new material and let bygones be bygones — he has to be capable of better than this.

Fortunately the evening was saved by Linda Rondstadt, whose sparkling presence and dynamic singing, coupled with slightly zany sex appeal, had the audience clamouring for more and more. In her Annie Oakley outfit and denim hot-pants, Linda could do no wrong. Even the fact that she was nervous — and it showed — seemed to fit in with her style.

Basically Linda Rondstadt is a country singer, although her songs drift lazily out of that category much of the time. She's equally at home on a soft ballad, or whooping it up. One thing she never does is shout to be heard above the large backing band, which included men from Steely Dan and three girl back-up singers. The balance was just perfect.

Her material included songs from the new album, as well as old favourites. Particularly attractive was a soft version of "Doesn't Matter Any More," which Paul Anka wrote for Buddy Holly, and her closing song "Long Long Time," her biggest hit single.

The music, coupled with her entertaining patter between songs and "girl-next-door" attraction, more than made up for McGuinn's disappointment. — CHRIS CHARLESWORTH.

ROGER McGUINN: fatal mistake

STEPHANE GRAPPELLI

APPLAUSE for a string quartet at London's Queen Elizabeth Hall on Bonfire Night but this time the lead violinist was Grappelli and the music jazz.

Though for decades he's led a separate and brilliant musical life, it's impossible to dissociate him from the genius of Django Reinhardt and the Quintette of the Thirties, with its startlingly original sound.

This group (one less rhythm guitar, but with Diz Dsley's strength you'd hardly notice) is not slavishly imitating. With Denny Wright on lead guitar and Len Skeat on fine rhythm bass, it's a new extension.

We heard "Manoir de mes Reeves," "Daphne," and "Huages," with Grappelli weaving lacework notes over musicians who have absorbed their Django, distill a new excitement.

In the standards, Grappelli's virtuosity shines brighter for the urgency of the other swinging strings. The encore was a generous Gershwin selection, with a great finish on "I Got Rhythm."

In the first half, Humphrey Lyttelton's Band played Humph's own compositions with him in his usual good form on trumpet. There was a mambo excursion — Bruce Turner's "Dabbe" for his fine alto and Kathy Stobart's tenor. — JEAN DELANEY.

J. J. BARNES

LET ME tell you about J. J. Barnes. He's a living legend.

He's black, American and a soul singer, and he became a Motown artist when Berry Gordy took over Ric-Tic.

His he had none but his desire was ideal for dancing and became firm favourites in the Northern discos and the rarest pressings changed hands for large sums of the ready. Of such stuff are soul legends made.

J.J. started a British tour last Thursday at London's 100 Club and the legend proved an enjoyably expressive if unexceptional vocalist.

Barnes' programme was heavily laced with soul standards — "Get Ready," "Backstoppers" — and perhaps too few of his own songs (only "Please Let Me Dinger" and "Wig Wam Bam" were played in full, others were merely hinted at during a rather turgid "Sittin' On The Dock Of The Bay").

There was an excellent version of the Carpenters' "Close To You" despite its cool welcome from one soul brother who, on recognising the MOR tune, gave forth with a loudly belaboured oath. Maybe someone trod on his foot.

But as always it's interesting to see a legend, if only a clichéd one, whose after-dinner odour of mid-Sixties after-dinner disco records; played were at the very least three guys making cassette recordings of Barnes' performance. It was clearly an event. Near the end of the set in a pause between numbers J.J. starts signing autographs. He spends the rest of the next number, "Stormy Monday" commuting twixt microphone and organ, singing and scribbling. Just keeping the customers satisfied.

Barnes sweated and seemed happily surprised at his popularity here. Soul music, it seems, is once again the real underground music. Must be fun to be a living legend. — GEOFF BROWN.

SWEET

HUNDREDS of scarves, roses, stes, screams and tears greeted the Sweet as they opened their six-city British warm-up tour at Newcastle City Hall last week.

It was all new — new stage act, new lighting, new back-ground film and two new changes of costume. And do you know, it wasn't bad. Even the staunchest, oldest rock freak with an open mind would have admitted it wasn't bad.

No one, least of all the band themselves, will deny that the Sweet have been regarded as a bit of a joke band in rock circles in the past but even this older, brought up on the Brown Ale, the Stones and the Who, is forced to admit to their ability to generate considerable excitement among the little people.

It's rough, it's harsh, it's loud and it could be no stretch of the imagination be called tasteful, but the lilies just lapped it up. Man, I really began to feel old.

The Sweet began this tour (a bigger one will follow next March) in search of a greater respect from a wider musical audience, and this is their first big attempt to make a breakthrough into the concert hall scene, and after a three-month lay-off, they were looking noticeably apprehensive about the gig — especially drummer Mick Tucker who admitted he was "petrified".

The night began with a recording of "The Stripper" coupled with an appropriate and very entertaining piece of film flashed onto the giant screen at the back of the stage. Then came the flashing lights, sirens and the group leaped dramatically on stage to the screams of hundreds of school-girl throats, and they were off into their hit single, "Nellie".

And following that amazing opening, the Sweet could do very little wrong. Relying heavily on recorded tapes, their set consisted of six of their famous B-sides and on hit single after another: "Wig Wam Bam," "Little Willy," "Blockbuster" and "Ballroom Blitz". There was an appalling rendering of the Who's "I'm A Boy" but that memory was erased by some really excellent guitar playing from Andy Scott on "Done Me Wrong Alright" and "Man With The Golden Arm", an amazing piece in which drummer Mick Tucker actually accompanied a sound-tracked film of himself on the screen.

The group had problems with their sound all night and I thought they could have made better use of their new lighting and film units and also made more attempt to communicate with their audience between numbers.

The band themselves were a little disappointed with the way things had gone. Said guitarist Andy Scott: "You know, it just sounded like a bunch of guys getting up on stage and doing a few Sweet numbers, which is exactly what it was." — KEITH GING.

STARRY EYED AND LAUGHING

STARRY EYED AND LAUGHING. What a beautiful name for a band. You'll have possibly seen the ads in the back of the "NME" containing the old papers does that name. The band had better be a good 'un.

Friday night, Queen Mary College, Mile End in London. Let's see how good they are.

It must first be said that at present they owe a lot to the Byrds in sound and inspiration. They play "Turn, Turn, Turn," "Chimes of Freedom" and "Mr Tambourine Man." The numbers are crowd pleasers, used as framework to push their own songs, which incidentally, I preferred.

The original songs the four-piece group is writing are good. They are written by Starry Eyed's two guitarists — Tony Poole and Ross McGeeney — and though the presence of a whole lotta 12-string guitar still retains the merest scent of the Byrds, the group is already developing a style very much its own.

Drummer Nick Brown is an unfussy drummer, the bassist, who due to contractual complications has to remain nameless, is good. He played lead guitar on a couple of numbers and sounded a bit like Mell Young.

Vocally the band lean a lot on Poole and he can take the weight easily. McGeeney was, I felt, the weak link. He was missing rather too many of the top harmonies by rather too wide a margin for comfort. It was the only poor part of their act.

Pick of their own numbers were "Living in London," "Oh What," "I Came From The South," "Cliff Top" and "Everybody."

It would be interesting to see the band play their Byrds numbers nearer the beginning of the set and rely on their own numbers to close. They'd get a fairer idea of their strength.

Despite playing in a room with dead acoustics to an audience which sat on the floor rather than danced on it, Starry Eyed and Laughing kept at it, played their music and got the dancin' response they were after.

A lovely name, a fine band. The next few months will see them becoming a hot tip for future success. Watch 'em. — GEOFF BROWN.

ANGE

CHANCES of any French rock bands, as few and far between as they may be, ever being a big success on this side of the Channel seem pretty remote. They lack roots like a basic rock 'n' roll tradition and thus tend to rarify their music into inaccessibility.

Ange are probably the least guilty of this charge, though they slip the other way on occasion and allow their music to become simplistic.

At Dingwall's, London, last week, continuing their fourth British tour, there was some thing of the surreal about their presence. This was largely caused by lead singer and organist, Christian Decamps, and his stage antics: his big bulging eyes and gestures of a mime artiste. In "Le Soir du Diable" he wore a devil puppet on each hand. His brother, Francis, acted like a Spanish Inquisitor, kept jabbing the keyboard of the other organ as if he was afraid it might bite him.

A special rapport between the two brothers, who compose all the group's material, flagrantly goaded the set gradually to a climax. Although the music was a little repetitive the band played with great fervour.

The sound of the two organs merged into a Mighty Wurlitzer effect, but there was only a modicum of guitar from Jean-Michel Brezouard who, dressed in alchemist's robes, hung back. When the odd brief guitar solo did break out the excitement previously created by the domineering organ chords moved up a few notches.

In "Dignite" especially it appeared that Jean-Michel was being underrated, and underused. But one of the most successful numbers overall was Jacques Breil's "Ces Gens-La", tailor made for the band's dramatic delivery.

Although the "shape" of the six numbers in the set was defined and regular there seemed no special design behind it. For British audiences it must always be a case of "presque vu." — JEFF WARD.

CONSULTANCY & INSTALLATION SERVICE

The basic service provided is the installation of equipment supplied by Audio T. However, we also offer a far-ranging service on a professional level. We can liaise with architects in the planning stages of your house so as to install built-in high fidelity systems. In such cases, the service includes pre-wiring so that unsightly electrical cables are hidden in walls, and engineering drawings of cut outs for equipment can be made to ease the architect's job, as well as the final installation and setting up of equipment.

AMPLIFIER TESTING/SERVICE

If you would like to see how your unit measures, just bring it in to us (after phoning to make an appointment first, please) and we will carry out the following tests: power output, signal to noise ratio, percentage total harmonic distortion, the type of distortion etc.

NO PACKAGE SYSTEMS

As we try to suggest equipment which we feel will suit your own particular requirements, we would like to know details of the size of your listening room, etc., to enable us to recommend equipment which we feel is right for you.

The Mods rule again

THE era of the mod is at hand once again. This creature of the early sixties is being re-born. Bowie's "Pin-Ups" bathes us ageing twenty-five-year olds in warm nostalgia. Townshend's "Quadrophonia" is a homage to the mod. In his interview (MM October 27) he remembers the intimacy of the early "in-crowd" modism. The Marquee and its "modist" elite is an element of continuity for both. How long will it be before the style of that halcyon exclusiveness returns? How long must we ancient creat-

Striking Rich is so unjust

WOODALL, Brunel Court, Westfields Avenue, Barnes, S.W.13.

Indescribable

WE tried and tried to think of a way of describing the happiness and warmth generated at a Lindisfarne concert. How could you describe both this and the high standard of music which they provide?

We're sure thousands will agree that there's only one word that describes them adequately — INDESCRIBABLE. — CATHY AND SUE, Haydn Road, Liverpool. P.S. Bet you don't print this because it's Lindisfarne and not a super trendy like Bowie.

Sharp eyes

WHY is it the Americans always spot talent first? Rod Stewart and Elton John for example, both made it in America first.

This is a plea to British rock fans. Don't let Man leave these shores! — SUE VICKERY, Hawthorn Avenue, Eastcote, Ruislip, Middlesex.

Bubble burst

IN summer '72 I came up with the idea of a concept album — old songs, new styles — called "Bubblerock 1s Here To Stay".

Perhaps people would like to dig it out and give it a listen between the new releases (David Bowie, Bryan Ferry, etc.). — JONATHAN KING, UK Records, 48 Grafton Way, London, W.1.

YOUR accusation that Buddy Rich's outburst on the Michael Parkinson TV show was "a classic case of intolerant misunderstanding" (MM Opinion) is as untrue as it is unjust.

Rich voiced the opinions of many people, both in and out of the music business, who realise only too well that groups like the Osmonds and Led Zeppelin are little more than big business hypes in whom thousands of pounds and dollars have been invested.

Their musical worth is negligible — as time alone will tell.

I think that Mr. Rich is well aware that fans used to be called bobby-soxers and I notice that you carefully omitted the fact that Rich talked at considerable length about Frank Sinatra who started all the teenage mass hysteria back in the early forties — but Sinatra has survived!

And as Rich carefully explained Sinatra's decision to return to recording is the best thing that has happened in the music business this year. — JOHN GEE, Nottingham Place, London W.1.

IT seems to me a great pity when musicians of the brilliance of Buddy Rich have such narrow-minded attitudes towards other types of music.

OK, so I don't dig the Osmonds or a lot of groups that are around at the moment, but I don't go slagging them off for the sake of it.

Doesn't Buddy Rich realise that these groups entertain their fans just as he entertains his? — PAUL BRADDOCK, Southern Road, Manchester.

DONNY OSMOND: big business hype?

ures of the sixties fantasise? And how long must we wait for the return of our Cathy and R.S.G?

The Second Coming is at hand. The Rolling Stones will play real rosey Rhythm and Blues. Phil May will recultivate his pimples. The Union Jack will be back. — MIKE OWENS, Saxon Green, Gregory Street, Lenton, Nottingham.

LP WINNER

Own Man

"MAN are the Allman Brothers Band of Britain," you say. What an insult.

Man are the Man Band of the World and have no need to be compared to an over-rated American band.

Their last two studio albums can compare with anything. Among their many live offerings comes some of the best guitar work one can hope to hear and a Man gig is always full of surprises, entertainment and excellent music. — JOHN ELLIS, Moss Lane, Orrell Park, Liverpool 9.

Jimi rules

IN reply to the letter from M. D. Lewfield (October 27), it is necessary for readers to assume that because Cassidy, Glitter, Osmonds and other weenybop ram-jam-glam did not appear in the MM Poll they do not represent good music capable of being enjoyed by adult-minded people.

Donny and David are definitely not sweeter than Maggie Bell and Lou Reed, Slade's act is far from being more original than the Emerson knife-throwing "turn-on," and it is thanks to David Bowie that acts like Gary Glitter manage to sparkle at all.

Henrix still rules, though. — T. REYNOLDS, Dolphin Road, Currie, Midlothian.

Feel it, Pete

SO Pete Townshend thought HENDRIX played some bum notes at the Isle of Wight Festival.

OK, so the low record was bad, even depressing, but if you listen to the low tracks from the Hendrix film soundtrack, especially "Red House," you can hear (and feel) some of the most soulful guitar that Jimi ever played, despite the looseness of the version.

And talking of versions, Clapton's Rainbow treatment of "Little Wing" though excellent in its own right, pales in comparison with the guts and soul of Jimi's version on "In The West."

As the man said: "What matters is feeling." — Right Pete, right Eric? — NEIL FORDEY, Fitzwilliam College, Cambridge.

Copy cats

WHY do so many singles artists release records that sound like copies off album tracks? One out now is David Essex "Lamplight," which sounds extremely like Leon Russell's "Tightrope."

A prayer

DOES Steve Lake really think the Mahavishnu Orchestra are over-praised? Look back over the recent past and consider all the honours they have won, both as a group and individually. I have both albums by them and find them full of genius, imagination, and of a very fine quality.

Pray for deliverance from your misguidance. — C.

Why we quit

AFTER reading the letter from Steve Proctor and Geoff Ireland in Mailbag, I thought I'd better reply and sort things out.

10cc travelled four hours and actually got to the Global Village, Charing Cross at 5 o'clock. Our road crew had already been there four hours trying to get our equipment on the stage.

The stage should have been 30ft wide by 20ft deep, as asked for in all our contracts. The stage at the Global Village turned out to be 11ft wide by 8ft deep. This only being told to our agents when we were already on our way down there.

As you are aware, 10cc have stated in interviews that they would try to reproduce their record sound on stage. This has involved us in buying equipment to the tune of £15,000. On a stage 11ft x 8ft we cannot even accommodate our two drum kits, therefore we cannot put on the kind of performance people expect from us. We had invited over 150 press and guests to the gig and after much arguing had to cancel it.

We have travelled four hours, lost over £200 in hotel bills, car hire, etc, and ended up heading home very disappointed.

The last thing 10cc want is cancelled gigs. It's taken us two years to get off our backsides in the studio and get the act on the road. Don't blame 10cc. Blame promoters who sign contracts with fairy tale dimensions.

These guys are the reason so many groups have to cancel. It's got so bad, that we have to send our road crew to check gigs two weeks before we're due to play them.

Sorry about the disappointment Steve and Geoff. Hope you can catch one of our other London gigs in October. — ERIC STEWART, 10cc.
